

ON THE CHRONICLES OF CEYLON

By BIMALA CHURN LAW

D.LITT., PH.D., M.A., B.L.

President, Calcutta Geographical Society, Iran Society, Prāgyavāni Mandira, Indian Research Institute, Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal; Honorary Fellow, Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland; Fellow, Royal Asiatic Society (Bombay Branch); Fellow, Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal; Hony. Correspondent to the Archaeological Survey of India; Hony. Member, Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute and Ganesh Math Jyoti Research Institute; Corporate Member, American Oriental Society; Fellow, Royal Geographical Society of London; Author, Aśvaghosa, Buddhaghosa, History of Pali Literature, Tribes in Ancient India, Geography of Early Buddhism, Geographical Essays, India as described in early texts of Buddhism and Jainism, Concepts of Buddhism, Mahāvīra: His Life and Teachings, etc., etc

PUBLISHED BY THE ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY OF BENGAL
1 PAIK CHALL, CALCUTTA

PREFACE

In this treatise an attempt has been made to present a careful and exhaustive study of the chronicles of Ceylon in a spirit of scientific research. In 1908 Geiger made a critical study of this subject for the first time in his work on The Dīpavamsa and Mahāvamsa and their Historical development of Ceylon. In 1928 G. P. Mahāsekera published a book on the Pali Literature of Ceylon (J.R.A.S. publication, Prize Publication Fund, Vol. X) and in 1933 I, in my History of Pali Literature, dealt with the same topic. In the present book my treatment is different from that of the previous writers. In three chapters I have discussed the chronological, literary, and historical position of the chronicles in Pali and Sinhalese. I have tried to utilize all the available materials, which may be gathered from ancient and modern literature on the subject. This work is, I believe, new in its treatment, and will remove a long-felt want. I shall consider my labour amply rewarded, if it be of some use to scholars interested in the Ceylonese chronicles.

Calcutta,
43 Kailas Bose Street,
February, 1947.

}

BIMALA CHURN LAW.

CONTENTS

	Page
Preface	iii
Bibliography	vii
CHAPTER I
Chronological Position	1
CHAPTER II
Literary Position	29
CHAPTER III
Historical Position	43
Index	73

BIBLIOGRAPHY

1. Academy, September, 1874.
2. Ancient India as described by Megasthenes and Arrian (J. W. McCrindle, 1926).
3. Asoka (D. R. Bhandarkar, 2nd Ed., 1932).
4. Asoka (Radhakumud Mookerji, 1928).
5. Asoka and His Inscriptions (B. M. Barua, 1946).
6. Aśvaghoṣa (B. C. Law, R.A.S.B. Monograph Series, Vol. I, 1946).
7. Buddhaddatta's Manual (A. P. Buddhaddatta, 1915).
8. Buddhaghosa (B. C. Law, Bombay Branch Royal Asiatic Society, Monograph No. I, 1946).
9. Buddhavaṃsa (J.P.T.S., 1882).
10. Buddhist India (T. W. Rhys Davids).
11. Buddhist Records of the Western World (S. Beal).
12. Buddhist Suttas (Rhys Davids, S.B.E., Vol. XI).
13. Cambodian Mahāvamsa (J.R.A.S., 1902).
14. Catalogue Du Fonds, Tibetan (Cordier).
15. Catalogue of Sinhalese Manuscripts (Wickremasinghe).
16. Catalogue of the Chinese Translation of the Buddhist Tripiṭaka (Bunyii Nanjio).
17. Ceylon Lectures (B. M. Barua).
18. Cūlavamsa (Ed. Geiger, P.T.S.).
19. Dāthāvamsa (Ed. and Tr. B. C. Law, 1925).
20. Dāthāvamsa (Tr. M. Coomaraswamy, 1874).
21. Debates Commentary (Eng. Tr. of Kathāvattthupparakaraṇa-aṭṭhakathā by B. C. Law, P.T.S.).
22. Dhātumūlā.
23. Dhātuvamsa.
24. Dictionary of Pali Proper Names, 2 Vols. (G. P. Malalasekera).
25. Dipavamsa (Ed. and Tr. Oldenberg, 1879).
26. Dipavamsa (Tr. E. M. Coomaraswamy, 1908).
27. Dipavamsa and Mahāvamsa (Geiger).
28. Dipavamsa und Mahāvamsa und die Geschichtliche Überlieferung in Ceylon (Geiger, Leipzig, 1905).
29. Divyavadāna (Cowell and Neil).
30. Early History of Buddhism in Ceylon (E. W. Adikaram).
31. Epigraphia Zeylanica, Vols. I and III.
32. Extended Mahāvamsa (Ed. G. P. Malalasekera, R.A.S. Ceylon Branch).
33. Gandhavamsa (J.P.T.S., 1886).
34. History of Pali Literature, 2 Vols. (B. C. Law).
35. Holy Bible—St. Matthew.
36. India as described in early texts of Buddhism and Jainism (B. C. Law).
37. Indian Antiquary, Vol. XXXV.
38. Indian Culture, Vol. XII.
39. Indian Historical Quarterly, Vol. VIII.
40. J.A.S.B., 1837.
41. J.B.B.R.A.S., XI, 1875.
42. J.P.T.S., 1886, 1902-3.
43. J.R.A.S., 1896, 1898, 1902, 1905, 1906.
44. J.R.A.S., Ceylon Branch, XXIII.
45. Jātaka (Fausböll).
46. Journal of the Department of Letters, Vol. I (Calcutta University).
47. Kathāvattthupparakaraṇa-aṭṭhakathā (J.P.T.S., 1889).
48. Le Dāthāvaṇṇa : On Histoire de la dent relique du Buddha Gotama, 1884.
49. Legend of the Topes (Eng. Tr. of Thūpavamsa by B. C. Law, Bibliotheca Indica, 1945).

- 50 Mabābhārata (Vangavāsi Ed)
- 51 Mahabodhivamsa (P T S)
- 52 Mahāvamsa (Geiger's Ed and Tr , P T S)
- 53 Mahāvamsa (Turnaur's Ed and Tr , 1837)
- 54 Mahāvamsa (H Sumangala and Baṭuwanṭudawe, Colombo, 1905)
- 55 Mahāvamsa (Eng Tr by L C Wijesinha, 1909)
- 56 Mahāvamsa (Sinhalese Tr by Wijesinha, 1889)
- 57 Manaratbapūraṇi (P T S)
- 58 Manual af Buddhist Historical Traditions (Eng Tr of Saddhammasaṅgaha by B C Law, 1911)
- 59 Manual of Indian Buddhism (Kern)
- 60 Milindapañño (Ed V Trenckner)
- 61 Minor Anthologies of the Pali Canon Pt III—Buddhavaṃsa and Carivāṇa (Eng Tr by B C Law, S B B , Vol IX, 1938)
- 62 Nalāṭadhatuvamsa
- 63 Nikāya Sangrahava (Tr C M Fernando, 1908, edited by Gunawardhana)
- 64 On Yuan Chwang's travels in India by Thomas Watters (edited by T W Rhys Davids and S W Bushell 1904)
- 65 Pali Literature of Ceylon (G P Malalasekera)
- 66 Paramatthadīpani on Therīgāthā (P T S)
- 67 Paṭisambhūdamagga (P T S)
- 68 Petavatthu (P T S)
- 69 Points of Controversy (P T S Tr Series)
- 70 Pujavaliya, Colombo Ed , 1897
- 71 Rajavaliya (Tr by B Gunasekara, Colombo 1900)
- 72 Rājaraṭnakaraya, Colombo, 1887, edited by Simon de Silva Colombo 1907
- 73 Saddhammasaṅgaha (Ed N Saddhānanda, J.P.T.S., 1890)
- 74 Samantapasādhika (P T S)
- 75 Sāratthappakāsinī (P T S)
- 76 Sasanavamsa (P T S)
- 77 Same Kṣatriya Tribes of Ancient India (B C Law)
- 78 Study of the Mahāvastu and its Supplement (B C Law)
- 79 Sumaṅgalavilāsinī (P T S)
- 80 Thūpavamsa (Ed B C Law)
- 81 Thupavamsa (Sinhalese Ed Dhammaratana, 1806)
- 82 University of Ceylon Review, Vols II and IV
- 83 Uttaravahāra Mahāvamsa
- 84 Vamsatthappakāsinī, 2 Vols (P T S)
- 85 Vimānavatthu (P T S)
- 86 Vinaya Piṭaka (P T S)
- 87 Vuttamalā (Upatapaṣṣi)
- 88 Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, Vol XXI
- 89 Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft, 63, 1909

CHAPTER I

CHRONOLOGICAL POSITION

It is not unreasonably claimed that so far as the Buddhist world is concerned, the Theras of Ceylon stand unrivalled in the field of Chronicles narrating not only the political history of their island but also the ecclesiastical history of their faith. If the Dīparamsa is the oldest known Pali chronicle produced in Ceylon, the Sāsanaṃsaṃsādīpa by Thera Vimalasāra is certainly the latest one (1929). In between the two we have first of all general introductions to the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī and a few other commentaries written by Buddhaghosa, the pioneer Pali commentator, and after that the general introduction to the Samantapāsādikā, the Mahāraṃsa by Mahānāma in its two recensions, the Mahābodhirāṃsa, the Dīparamsaṭṭhakathā, the Vaṃsaṭṭhappakāsinī, the Dāthāraṃsa, the Thūpa-raṃsa, the Uṭṭiyaraṃsaṭṭhakathā, the Nalātadhāturaṃsa, and the Saddhammasaṅgaha, all written in Pali, and, above all, the Cūḷaraṃsa representing the continuation of the Mahāraṃsa through its later supplements. In the list one must include also such Sinhalese writings as the Pūjāvalī, the Nikāyaśaṅgraha, the Dhāturaṃsa, the Rājāvalī, the Rājaraṭnākara and Tuttamālā. Although we have a masterly dissertation on the chronological position of these works from the pen of Geiger, it is necessary to reconsider it before dealing with their literary position.

1. Dīparamsa.¹—The main reason advanced for regarding this Pali Chronicle of Ceylon as a work of antiquity is that it stands, as distinguished from the rest which are chronologically later, as the literary production of a school or community, and not as the composition of an individual author. It is considered to be the last of the literary works of Ceylon which had no special authors.² Oldenberg places the closing date of the Dīparamsa in its extant form between the beginning of the fourth and the first third of the fifth century A.D. Malalasekora while discussing the question of its closing date significantly observes: 'It could not have been closed before the beginning of the fourth century, because its narrative extends till about A.D. 302. Buddhaghosa quotes several times from the Dīpavaṃsa, but his quotations differ in some details from our version. In the Mahāvamsa we are told that Dhātusena (459-77) ordered the Dīpavaṃsa to be recited in public at the annual Mahinda festival, so that by that time the Dīpavaṃsa had been completed. After that date it fell into disuse, its glory outdone by the more brilliant work of Mahānāma; but it seems to have been studied till much later, because Dhammakitti III of the Āraṇyakavāsī sect quotes it in his Saddhammasaṅgaha (p. 47, v. 7; p. 49, vv. 8 foll.) with great respect as a work of much merit and immense importance.'²

¹ Vide Oldenberg Ed. and Tr. (1879); Geiger Ed. and Tr. (P.T.S., 1908 and 1912); Geiger, Dīparamsa und Mahāraṃsa und die geschichtliche überlieferung in Ceylon, Leipzig 1905; Tr. by E. M. Coomaraswamy, Colombo, 1908; Z.D.M.G., 63, 1909, 540ff.; Indian Antiquary, XXXV, p. 443; Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, Vol. XXI, pp. 203 and 307. The Dīparamsa puts together some well-known traditions handed down among the Buddhists of Ceylon sometimes in a clumsy manner. For historical and geographical data from this chronicle (Vide B. C. Law, History of Pali Literature, II, Chap. VI, pp. 555ff.).

² Malalasekera, The Pali Literature of Ceylon, p. 132.

The important question which arises at the outset is—what was the exact form of this chronicle, when king Dhātusena caused it to be recited in public year after year during the Mahinda festival? To put it in other words, did the narrative of the Dīpavaṃsa, as it was then known, extend beyond the advent of Mahinda in the island and the establishment of the Good Faith through his efforts? Evidently it did not extend beyond this great event in the early history of Ceylon. It is also not quite correct to say that this chronicle is not the work of any individual author. Let us see what light its opening verses throw on its contents and author.

*Dīpāgamaṇaṃ Buddhassa dhātu ca³ bodhiyāgamaṇi saṅgahācariyavādaṇ⁴ ca dīpaṃhi sāsanāgamaṇi narindāgamaṇaṃ vaṃsaṃ⁵ kittayissaṃ, suṇātha me.
pitipāmojjajananaṃ paśādeyyaṃ manoraṃaṇi anekākārasampannaṃ cīlīkatvā suṇātha me.
udaggacittā sumanā paṭaṇṇhā tuṭṭhamānasā niddosaṃ bhadravacanaṃ sakkaccaṃ sampatīcchatha.
suṇātha sabbe paṇidhāya mānasaṇi, vaṃsaṃ parakkhāmi paramparāgataṃ⁶ thutippasatthaṃ⁷ bahunābhivaṇṇitaṃ etaṃhi nūnākuu-maṇi va ganthitaṃ,*

¹ Dīpavaṃsa, edited and translated by Oldenberg, p. 0.

² The Pāli Literature of Ceylon, p. 138.

³ Variants in the Vamsatthappakāsinī, p. 36—dhātūnaṃ, dhātū ca.

⁴ ibid., p. 36, saṅgahā theravādaṇ.

⁵ vaṃsaṃ.

⁶ ābhatam.

⁷ atippasatthaṃ.

anūpamaṃ vaṃsavaraḡḡavāsinaṃ¹ apubbaṃ anaññaṃ tathasuppakāṣitaṃ² ariyāḡataṃ³ uttamasabbhi vaṇṇitaṃ suṇātha⁴ dīpaṭṭhuti sādhusakkaṭaṃ.

‘The chronicle of Buddha’s coming to the island, the arrival of the relic and the Bo (tree), the collection of the Teacher’s words (made at the Councils), the rise of the schools of teachers, the propagation of the religion in the island and the coming of (Vijaya), the chief of men, I am going to narrate, listen to me. Listen attentively to me, (the chronicle which is capable of) generating joy and gladness, (and which is) pleasing and delightful and endowed with various forms. With an elated mind, well pleased, extremely glad (and) with heart’s content respectfully accept the faultless (and) good words. Listen all with rapt attention (when) I narrate the chronicle handed down from generation to generation, highly praised, described by many—this being like a garland woven of many kinds of flowers. Listen (when I describe) the eulogy of the island which is honoured by good men—the excellent chronicle of the best and foremost (among the teachers), (which is) new, unrivalled and well set forth, handed down by the elect and praised by those described as the best of the holy ones.’

Here the expression, suṇātu me, ‘Listen to me’, is significant as a form of supplication made by an individual who was in the rôle of the narrator or author of the chronicle.’ Such is precisely the way in which Mahānāma, the author of the Mahāvamsa, exhorts the interested hearers, i.e. readers, to hear the chronicle he was going to narrate well. Behind the Pali Canonical expressions, suṇātu me bhante, suṇantu bhonto mama ekavākyam, the speaker is a single individual. Thus looked at from this point of view, the Dīpavamsa is as much the composition of a single author as the Mahāvamsa, in spite of the fact that the name of the author of the former is yet unknown.

The enumeration of the themes of the Dīpavamsa in its earlier form is equally important for the reason that it does not take us beyond the establishment of the Buddhist Order in the island by Mahinda and Saṅghamittā. This chronicle in its present form closes, like Mahānāma’s great work, with the reign of Mahāsena. The subject matters of its earlier form

¹ Variants in the Vamsatthappakāsinī, p. 36, vādiṇam.

² “ “ “ “ kaṭaṃ suppakāṣitaṃ.

³ “ “ “ “ ariyāḡataṃ or ariyābhataṃ.

⁴ “ “ “ “ suṇantu.

go only to suggest that the chronicle grew into its present form by stages. Even it seems possible that the Dīparamśa in its first stage closed with Chapter VIII of which the concluding verse reads:

Laṅkādīpararam gantvā Mahindo attapaṇcamaḥ sāsanam thāvaram latvā mocesi bandhanā bahuḥ

This verse would seem sufficient for the subject of sāsanapatiṭṭhā dealt with in the chronicle in its first stage, the description being quite in keeping with those of other Buddhist missions. That which follows and fills as many as nine bhāṇavāras (Chapters IX–XVII) is just a later elaboration of the matter. The recitation of the chronicle concluded with an account of the death of Mahinda and its sequel would be enough and appropriate for the Mahinda festival in Dhātusena's time:

Kaṭam sarīranikkhepam Mahindam dīpajotakam Isibhūmīti tam nāmam samaññū paḥhamam ahū

The themes mentioned in the prologue leave out of account the Mahārājavamsa contained in Chapter III. This at once appears to have been a separate entity, the absence of which would not cause any break in the historical narration of the events; rather its presence interferes with the continuity.

A version of the Dīparamśa as known to the Theras of the Mahāvihāra is presupposed by the general introduction to the Vinaya-Commentary known as the Samantapāsādikā. It is interesting to find that the history of Buddhism given in it is ended precisely with the account of the foundation of the Buddhist Holy Order in the island by Mahinda and his sister Saṅghamittā.

There are two other lines of argument by which one may arrive at the conclusion that the Dīparamśa history had not extended beyond the reign of Asoka and his Ceylon contemporary Devānampiya Tissa even in the second stage of its growth. They are as follows:—

1. That the Dīparamśa account of the Buddhist sects is completely silent on the rise of the later sects in Ceylon.¹
2. That there is a great disparity between the Dīparamśa and the Mahārājavamsa as regards the rivalry between the monks of the Mahāvihāra and the Abhayagiri monastery, especially the mischievous activity of the wicked Sona and the wicked Mitta.¹

¹ IXpāṇṇama, V, 54; H. C. Law, Index to Commentaries, p. 5.

Another important fact which has bearing upon the question of the date of the Dīpavaṃsa is its account of the early Buddhist sects. It is said that each sect with its rise made certain textual changes and adopted certain new rules of discipline. Particularly in connection with the Mahā-saṅghikas it says: 'The Bhikkhus of the Great Council settled a doctrine contrary (to the true Faith). Altering the original redaction they made another redaction. They transposed Suttas which belonged to one place (of the collection) to another place; they destroyed the (true) meaning and the Faith in the Vinaya and in the five Collections (of Suttas). Those Bhikkhus, who understood neither what had been taught in long expositions nor without exposition, neither the natural meaning nor the recondite meaning, settled a false meaning in connection with spurious speeches of Buddha; these Bhikkhus destroyed a great deal of (true) meaning under the colour of the letter. Rejecting single passages of the Suttas and of the profound Vinaya, they composed other Suttas and another Vinaya which had (only) the appearance (of the genuine ones). Rejecting the following texts, viz. the Parivāra which is an abstract of the contents (of the Vinaya), the six sections of the Abhidhamma, the Paṭisambhidā, the Niddesa, and some portions of the Jātaka, they composed new ones.'²

All these details about the various Buddhist sects go to connect even the earlier form of the Dīpavaṃsa with an age which is posterior to the Parivāra written by Dīpa who was evidently a Thera of Ceylon. The date of composition of the Parivāra itself cannot be placed earlier than the reign of Vattagāmaṇi during which the Pali canonical texts as handed down by an oral tradition were first caused to be committed to writing.³ The Parivāra embodies a tradition in verse regarding the succession of the Vinaya teachers in Ceylon from the days of Mahinda and his Indian companions. The succession of the leading theras in Ceylon from the time of Mahinda and that of the leading Theris from the time of Saṅghamittā given in the Dīpavaṃsa must have been based upon a cherished tradition. This fact may lead us to think that in an earlier stage the Dīpavaṃsa was closed with the first half of the Chapter XVIII and with the verse 44 which reads:

¹ Barua, Ceylon Lectures, pp. 77ff.

² Dīpavaṃsa, Oldenberg's Trans., vv. 32-37, pp. 140-141.

³ B. C. Law, History of Pali Literature, I, pp. 11 and 13.

'Idāni atthi aññāyo therikā majjhimā navā vibhajjariādī vīmayadharā sāsane pavēnipālakū bahussutā sīlasampannā obhāsentī mahimāman tī'

Here the word idāni 'now', which occurs also as the first word of the first verse in the Chapter XVIII is significant. By it the author must have referred to a contemporary state of things.

The mention of the six later Buddhist sects, viz. Hemavatikā, Rājagirikā, Siddhatthiā, Pubbāschiyā, Aparāschiyā and Aparā Rājagirikā,¹ is also important from the chronological point of view. The Pubbāschiyās and Aparāschiyās do not find mention in any Indian inscription earlier than those of Amarāvati and Nāgārjunikonda. The earlier eighteen and these later sects and schools of thought existed also in the time of Buddhaghosa, the author of the Kathāvatthu Attha lathā.²

The author of the Samantapāsādikā quotes verbatim the traditional verses from the Parivāra concerning the succession of the Vinaya teachers from Mahinda's time. These are sadly missed in the Dīpaṃsa edited by Oldenberg. But the occurrence of such verses regarding the succession of the Vinaya teachers among the Therīs from Saṅghamittā's time suggests that there were similar verses also regarding the succession of Vinaya teachers among the Therīs from Mahinda's time, and it seems quite probable that the verses were quoted in the Parivāra from the Dīpaṃsa itself, in which case we have to assume that these were later interpolations in the Vinaya text. If it be so, the Dīpaṃsa as presupposed by the general introduction to the Vinaya Commentary must have been concluded with the first half of the Chapter XVIII. This fact may be made clear by a comparison of the succession of the Vinaya Therīs in the Dīpaṃsa with that of the Vinaya Therīs incorporated into the Parivāra.

The Dīpaṃsa contains three slightly different traditions regarding Saṅghamittā and the Therīs who accompanied her. According to one³ Saṅghamittā, Rucinaudī, Kanakadattā and Sudhinā were the nuns, each of whom carried a branch of the Bo tree to the island of Ceylon:

¹ Dīpaṃsa viii, 24.

² Paṭiśānti vi, 24; Samantapāsādikā J 172; 182; 19; 21; 22; 23; 24; 25; 26; 27; 28; 29; 30; 31; 32; 33; 34; 35; 36; 37; 38; 39; 40; 41; 42; 43; 44; 45; 46; 47; 48; 49; 50; 51; 52; 53; 54; 55; 56; 57; 58; 59; 60; 61; 62; 63; 64; 65; 66; 67; 68; 69; 70; 71; 72; 73; 74; 75; 76; 77; 78; 79; 80; 81; 82; 83; 84; 85; 86; 87; 88; 89; 90; 91; 92; 93; 94; 95; 96; 97; 98; 99; 100; 101; 102; 103; 104; 105; 106; 107; 108; 109; 110; 111; 112; 113; 114; 115; 116; 117; 118; 119; 120; 121; 122; 123; 124; 125; 126; 127; 128; 129; 130; 131; 132; 133; 134; 135; 136; 137; 138; 139; 140; 141; 142; 143; 144; 145; 146; 147; 148; 149; 150; 151; 152; 153; 154; 155; 156; 157; 158; 159; 160; 161; 162; 163; 164; 165; 166; 167; 168; 169; 170; 171; 172; 173; 174; 175; 176; 177; 178; 179; 180; 181; 182; 183; 184; 185; 186; 187; 188; 189; 190; 191; 192; 193; 194; 195; 196; 197; 198; 199; 200; 201; 202; 203; 204; 205; 206; 207; 208; 209; 210; 211; 212; 213; 214; 215; 216; 217; 218; 219; 220; 221; 222; 223; 224; 225; 226; 227; 228; 229; 230; 231; 232; 233; 234; 235; 236; 237; 238; 239; 240; 241; 242; 243; 244; 245; 246; 247; 248; 249; 250; 251; 252; 253; 254; 255; 256; 257; 258; 259; 260; 261; 262; 263; 264; 265; 266; 267; 268; 269; 270; 271; 272; 273; 274; 275; 276; 277; 278; 279; 280; 281; 282; 283; 284; 285; 286; 287; 288; 289; 290; 291; 292; 293; 294; 295; 296; 297; 298; 299; 300; 301; 302; 303; 304; 305; 306; 307; 308; 309; 310; 311; 312; 313; 314; 315; 316; 317; 318; 319; 320; 321; 322; 323; 324; 325; 326; 327; 328; 329; 330; 331; 332; 333; 334; 335; 336; 337; 338; 339; 340; 341; 342; 343; 344; 345; 346; 347; 348; 349; 350; 351; 352; 353; 354; 355; 356; 357; 358; 359; 360; 361; 362; 363; 364; 365; 366; 367; 368; 369; 370; 371; 372; 373; 374; 375; 376; 377; 378; 379; 380; 381; 382; 383; 384; 385; 386; 387; 388; 389; 390; 391; 392; 393; 394; 395; 396; 397; 398; 399; 400; 401; 402; 403; 404; 405; 406; 407; 408; 409; 410; 411; 412; 413; 414; 415; 416; 417; 418; 419; 420; 421; 422; 423; 424; 425; 426; 427; 428; 429; 430; 431; 432; 433; 434; 435; 436; 437; 438; 439; 440; 441; 442; 443; 444; 445; 446; 447; 448; 449; 450; 451; 452; 453; 454; 455; 456; 457; 458; 459; 460; 461; 462; 463; 464; 465; 466; 467; 468; 469; 470; 471; 472; 473; 474; 475; 476; 477; 478; 479; 480; 481; 482; 483; 484; 485; 486; 487; 488; 489; 490; 491; 492; 493; 494; 495; 496; 497; 498; 499; 500; 501; 502; 503; 504; 505; 506; 507; 508; 509; 510; 511; 512; 513; 514; 515; 516; 517; 518; 519; 520; 521; 522; 523; 524; 525; 526; 527; 528; 529; 530; 531; 532; 533; 534; 535; 536; 537; 538; 539; 540; 541; 542; 543; 544; 545; 546; 547; 548; 549; 550; 551; 552; 553; 554; 555; 556; 557; 558; 559; 560; 561; 562; 563; 564; 565; 566; 567; 568; 569; 570; 571; 572; 573; 574; 575; 576; 577; 578; 579; 580; 581; 582; 583; 584; 585; 586; 587; 588; 589; 590; 591; 592; 593; 594; 595; 596; 597; 598; 599; 600; 601; 602; 603; 604; 605; 606; 607; 608; 609; 610; 611; 612; 613; 614; 615; 616; 617; 618; 619; 620; 621; 622; 623; 624; 625; 626; 627; 628; 629; 630; 631; 632; 633; 634; 635; 636; 637; 638; 639; 640; 641; 642; 643; 644; 645; 646; 647; 648; 649; 650; 651; 652; 653; 654; 655; 656; 657; 658; 659; 660; 661; 662; 663; 664; 665; 666; 667; 668; 669; 670; 671; 672; 673; 674; 675; 676; 677; 678; 679; 680; 681; 682; 683; 684; 685; 686; 687; 688; 689; 690; 691; 692; 693; 694; 695; 696; 697; 698; 699; 700; 701; 702; 703; 704; 705; 706; 707; 708; 709; 710; 711; 712; 713; 714; 715; 716; 717; 718; 719; 720; 721; 722; 723; 724; 725; 726; 727; 728; 729; 730; 731; 732; 733; 734; 735; 736; 737; 738; 739; 740; 741; 742; 743; 744; 745; 746; 747; 748; 749; 750; 751; 752; 753; 754; 755; 756; 757; 758; 759; 760; 761; 762; 763; 764; 765; 766; 767; 768; 769; 770; 771; 772; 773; 774; 775; 776; 777; 778; 779; 780; 781; 782; 783; 784; 785; 786; 787; 788; 789; 790; 791; 792; 793; 794; 795; 796; 797; 798; 799; 800; 801; 802; 803; 804; 805; 806; 807; 808; 809; 810; 811; 812; 813; 814; 815; 816; 817; 818; 819; 820; 821; 822; 823; 824; 825; 826; 827; 828; 829; 830; 831; 832; 833; 834; 835; 836; 837; 838; 839; 840; 841; 842; 843; 844; 845; 846; 847; 848; 849; 850; 851; 852; 853; 854; 855; 856; 857; 858; 859; 860; 861; 862; 863; 864; 865; 866; 867; 868; 869; 870; 871; 872; 873; 874; 875; 876; 877; 878; 879; 880; 881; 882; 883; 884; 885; 886; 887; 888; 889; 890; 891; 892; 893; 894; 895; 896; 897; 898; 899; 900; 901; 902; 903; 904; 905; 906; 907; 908; 909; 910; 911; 912; 913; 914; 915; 916; 917; 918; 919; 920; 921; 922; 923; 924; 925; 926; 927; 928; 929; 930; 931; 932; 933; 934; 935; 936; 937; 938; 939; 940; 941; 942; 943; 944; 945; 946; 947; 948; 949; 950; 951; 952; 953; 954; 955; 956; 957; 958; 959; 960; 961; 962; 963; 964; 965; 966; 967; 968; 969; 970; 971; 972; 973; 974; 975; 976; 977; 978; 979; 980; 981; 982; 983; 984; 985; 986; 987; 988; 989; 990; 991; 992; 993; 994; 995; 996; 997; 998; 999; 1000.

³ Samantapāsādikā vii, 22.

Rucānandā Kanakadattā Sudhammā ca mahiddhikā bahussutā Saṅghamittā chaḷabhiññā vicakkhaṇā catasso hi bhikkhuniyo sabbā ca bodhiṃ āharuṃ.

• According to another¹ the Therī Saṅghamittā was accompanied by ten other young nuns, viz. Uttarā, Hemā, Pasādapālā, Aggimittā, Dāsikā, Pheggu, Pabbatā, Mattā, Mallā and Dhammadāsiyā.²

According to the third³ the leading Therīs, Mahādevī, Padumā, Hemāsā, Unnalā, Añjali and Sumā, accompanied Saṅghamittā, together with sixteen thousand nuns.

It would seem that the third tradition was really about the nuns who flourished not during the reign of king Devānampiya Tissa, the Ceylon contemporary of Asoka, but during that of some other king of Ceylon who came into power after king Duṭṭhagāmaṇi Abhaya and before Kuṭikaṇṇa Tissa.

The three traditions may be reconciled only on the ground that the first of them is concerned with the five Therīs including Saṅghamittā, who were placed in charge of the five Bo-branches, the second with the eleven young nuns of importance including Saṅghamittā, and the third with the six leading Therīs among the many companions of Saṅghamittā.

The Dīpavaṃsa while giving an account of the Therīs, first of all, speaks of the well-known Therīs headed by Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī who became well versed in Vinaya (Vinayaññū) in the Master's lifetime. In the second stage it mentions the Therīs, headed by Saṅghamittā, who went to the island of Ceylon in Devānampiya Tissa's time and recited the five Vinaya books and the seven Abhidhamma treatises in Anurādhapura.⁴ Immediately after this, it offers a list of the eminent Therīs of the island who were ordained by the Therīs from India and who became noted for their special attainments. The Therīs of Ceylon are connected with the reign of Kākavaṇṇa Tissa and those of the next stage with that of his son and successor Duṭṭhagāmaṇi Abhaya. The Therīs of the next stage are assigned to a period which elapsed after the death of Duṭṭhagāmaṇi, while those of the sixth stage are referred to the time of Vaṭṭagāmaṇi Abhaya. It lists the leading Vinaya Therīs of the island, those connected with the reign of Kuṭikaṇṇa Abhaya and those with the reign of his son and

¹ Dīpavaṃsa, XVIII, vv. 11-12.

² Again, the list in Dīpavaṃsa, XV, vv. 77-78, has Māsagallā for Pasādapālā, Tappā for Pheggu and Mitāvadā for Dāsikā.

³ Dīpavaṃsa, XVIII, 24-25.

⁴ Ibid., XVIII, vv. 11-13.

Vinayaṃ vācayiṃsu piṭakaṃ Anurādhapuravhaye Vinaye pañca vācesuṃ satta c'eva pakaraṇe. (v. 13.)

successor Bhātiya Abhaya. It should be noted that the last mentioned king finds a respectful mention in the Samantapāsādikā in connection with a meeting of the monks called by him for the decision of a Vinaya point then in dispute.¹

The succession of the Vinaya teachers in the island is traced in the general introduction to the Samantapāsādikā from Mahinda and Aritthia to the date of composition of the Vinaya Commentary, while that cited from the Parivāra, and presumably also from the Dīpaṃsa, leads us to think of nineteen eminent successors of Mahinda. The latter may be taken to bring us as far down as the first or second century A.D.

Thus there is an earlier form of the Dīpaṃsa which was concluded with the reign of Bhātika Abhaya.

It is evident from the prose account in the general introduction to the Samantapāsādikā that the Dīpaṃsa presupposed by it contained Chapter XVII giving us an account of the visits of Kakusandha and other previous Buddhas to the island when it was known by other names in succession.

The Mahārājavaṃsa giving a genealogy of the Ikṣvāku rulers of the Solar race of Kṣattiyas from Mahāsammata to Suddhodana, which is now contained in Chapter III, appears to have been a separate chronicle by itself, bodily incorporated into the Dīpaṃsa. The canonical basis of the chronicle may be traced in the legends occurring in the Pāli Nikāya and the Mahāvastu. In what stage of the growth of the Dīpaṃsa it came to be included in it we cannot say. The introduction to the Samantapāsādikā throws no light on this point.

The traditional succession of the Vinaya teachers in the island of Ceylon, as presented in the Parivāra, speaks of twenty-nine generations traced from Mahinda. Unfortunately the later teachers are not connected with the reign of any king. Allowing twenty years for the interval between any two successive generations, it is possible to think that the list brings us down to the first quarter of the fourth century of the Christian era. The kings of Ceylon who find incidental mention in the writings of the great Buddhaghosa and in the Samantapāsādikā are none later than Mahānāga or Ceraṅga, Bhātika, Vāsabha and Sirināga. The career of an eminent Thera called Deva is connected in the Dīpaṃsa with the reign of Tissa, the second son of Sirināga I. If this Thera be no other than the leading Vinaya teacher who figures as the last but one in the above list, it may be concluded that the Dīpaṃsa as known to Buddhaghosa closed with the reign of Sirināga I and his two successors. Its final form, concluded with the reign of Mahāsenā, was probably reached in the reign of Dhātusena during which it was caused to be publicly recited.

Let us now see what becomes of the position of the Dīpavaṃsa when it is judged by the introductory verses of the Mahāvamsa which read:

Namassitvāna sambuddhaṃ susuddhaṃ suddhavaṃsajaṃ |

Mahāvamsaṃ pavakkhāmi nānānūnādhikārikaṃ ||

Porāṇehi kato p'eso ativithhārito kvaci |

atīva kvaci saṃkhitto, anekapunaruttako ||

Vajjitaṃ tehi dosehi sukhaggahaṇadhāraṇaṃ |

pasādasamvegakaraṃ sutito ca upāgataṃ ||

'Saluting the Supremely Enlightened One, the Pure One, and the Pure-born one, I am narrating the great Chronicle which is not deficient in its many and various themes. This, as composed by the ancients, is in some places very elaborate, in some places very concise, and contains many repetitions. I am narrating the great Chronicle, which is come down by tradition, free from these faults, easy of grasping and understanding, and which generates faith and inspires joy.'

Here the important question is—Does it or does it not mean the Pali Dīpavaṃsa by the previous Mahāvamsa composed by the ancients and presupposed by Mahānāma's Mahāvamsa? The author of the Mahāvamsa-Tīkā has been at pains to clear up the allusion. He maintains that here Mahānāma refers to the Aṭṭhakathā Mahāvamsa written in Sinhalese and cherished in the school of Mahāvihāra.¹ But the verses which he quotes in support of his thesis are all from the prologue to the Pali Dīpavaṃsa as we now have it.² The defects pointed out are all applicable to the same work. Whenever the traditional sayings are quoted in the writings of Buddhaghosa and other Pali commentaries they are all found to be in Pali verse.³ From the language of the introductory verses of the Mahāvamsa, it is not at all clear that the allusion is to an earlier form, of the Chronicle in a Sinhalese commentary. The work is not claimed to have been a translation from a Sinhalese original.

2. Aṭṭhakathā Mahāvamsa.—We have seen that an earlier Mahāvamsa composed by the ancients is presupposed

¹ Vamsatthappakāsinī, I, pp. 35-36.

² Ibid., I, p. 48: 'eso Sīhalaṭṭhakathā-Mahāvamsa porāṇehi Sīhalāya niruttīyā kato.'

³ B. C. Law, Buddhaghosa, pp. 45ff.

by the Mahāvamsa composed in verse by Mahānāma, and that the allusion is evidently to a chronicle of the Dīpavamsa type. Mahānāma does not refer to any commentary version of the Mahāvamsa written in Sinhalese, nor does he say that his work was a translation from Sinhalese into Māgadhi meaning Pali. The author of the Vamsatthappakāsinī has taken a lot of pains to explain the significance of the title of Mahāvamsa meaning 'The great Chronicle' as well as to enlighten us on the allusion to an earlier chronicle made in the words—porāṇchi kato p'eso, 'this as composed by the ancients'. The Mahāvamsa is the title adopted by Mahānāma for his own work. There was nothing to prevent him from loosely applying the same title to the earlier chronicle Dīpavamsa. He might easily have got the idea of such a title from a sectional caption, viz., Mahārājavamsa, used in the Dīpavamsa, Chapter III. Let us see what the author of the Mahāvamsa Commentary himself has got to say.¹

The scholiast has tried with his great erudition to exhaust all probable explanations of the introductory verses of the text. The work is called Mahāvamsa or 'Great Chronicle' not only due to the fact that it is the chronicle of the great kings and teachers but also because it deals with great themes. This twofold significance of the title is explained in the light of the verses from the prologue to the Dīpavamsa. The word dīpatthūti, literally meaning 'an eulogy of the island', which occurs in these verses, is similarly sought to be explained in the light of other verses from the prologue to the same earlier chronicle. Here these are quoted in the name of 'the Ancients': Ten'āhu Porāṇā. But it is not certainly true that these verses testify to the great number of topics dealt with (saṅkhyāmahattam). In explaining the significance of the verbal expression parakkhāmi, which literally means 'I will narrate well', the scholiast arbitrarily suggests that by it the author means to say that he was going to narrate the chronicle in the blameless Māgadhi or Pali language, abandoning the Sinhalese diction of the chronicle contained in the Porāṇatthakathā as taught in the school of Mahāvihāra. In the sequel, again, two authoritative verses are quoted from the Dīpavamsa, although in the name of the ancients. Evidently the scholiast has made the confusion between the traditional sayings of the Porāṇas in verse and the Sinhalese Porāṇatthakathā. It seems rather strange why he, instead of quoting the verses from the Dīpavamsa, quotes them in the name of the Porāṇas. Are we to understand that when the Atthakathā was first written, it was written in Sinhalese? If so, from whom did the inspiration come to write the commentary in Sinhalese in preference to Māgadhī (Pali)?

The Dīpavaṃsa presupposes indeed the Piṭaka commentaries when it says that king Vattagāmaṇi caused the Three Piṭakas to be committed to writing along with the Atthakathās:

*Piṭakattayapālīṇ ca tassā Atthakatham pi ca . . .
ciratthitattamaṃ dhammassa poṭṭhakesu likhāpayum.*¹

This very statement occurs also in the Mahāvamsa.²

But the question still remains—Were these Atthakathās the commentaries written in Sinhalese? As shown elsewhere,³ there is a commentary process to be noticed throughout the Three Piṭakas, in which case the statement, if at all correct, may be taken to mean that the first incentive to producing the commentaries in Sinhalese came from the direction given by Vattagāmaṇi. Whatever it may be, the traditional sayings of the ancients were all in Pali verses, and none in Sinhalese. The Mahāvamsa-Tīkā speaks, on the other hand, of a Porāṇatthakathā written in Sinhalese prose, in which evidently the Pali sayings of the ancients in verse were quoted. If so, the Mahāvamsa itself might be a later metrical version of an earlier prose chronicle in Sinhalese prose, but as regards the Dīpavaṃsa, it was composed or compiled on the basis of the traditional sayings of the ancients in Pali verse. In such circumstances the Dīpavaṃsa must have to be treated as chronologically earlier than the Atthakathā Mahāvamsa or the Sinhalese prose chronicle in the Porāṇatthakathā with the traditional Pali verses quoted here and there in the name of the Porāṇas.

In support of the statement of the Mahāvamsa-Tīkā regarding the earlier Atthakathā Mahāvamsa one may cite the evidence of the Pali commentaries ascribed to Buddhaghosa. One may even go so far as to premise that the general introduction to the Samantapāsādikā is only a verbatim reproduction in Pali of such an earlier chronicle in a Sinhalese Atthakathā. We have similar reproductions also in the general introduction to the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, the commentary on the Dīgha Nikāya, and in those to the Atthasālinī and the Kathāvatthu Atthakathā. These reproductions presuppose the Dīpavaṃsa and Sinhalese commentaries but nowhere Mahānāma's great work.

¹ Dīpavaṃsa, XX, 20-21.

² Mahāvamsa, XXXIII, 100-101.

³ B. C. Law, Buddhaghosa, pp. 55ff.

3. Mahāvamsa and Cūlavamsa.—The Mahāvamsa proper which is known as the great work of Mahānāma is to be distinguished from its later supplements edited by Geiger under a common title, namely, Cūlavamsa. The authors of the supplements applied the title of Mahāvamsa to their own compositions. Under this very title George Turnour published his edition and translation of the entire work. The relative chronological positions of the chronicle and its supplements may be stated thus: 'The Mahāvamsa proper with Duṭṭhagāmaṇi as its hero was composed by Mahānāma, the Cūlavamsa with Parakkamabāhu the great as its hero was composed by Dhammakitti, the second portion of the Cūlavamsa with Kittisiri as its hero was composed by Tibbetuvāve Siddhattha and concluded with a chapter added by Hikkādūve Siri Sumaṅgala. A laudable attempt has been made by the Venerable Yagirala Paññānanda to bring it down to modern times.'¹

(A) Mahāvamsa:² The Sinhalese equivalent of the Pali title of Mahānāma's great work is Paṇḍapadoruvamsa (Padypadoruvamsa).³ It means, according to the Mahāvamsa-Tikā, that Mahānāma composed this Pali chronicle in verse (padypadagāthābandhona) on the basis of the Sihalattakathā-Mahāvamsa of old.⁴ The author of the Tikā really means that the Mahānāma's composition was an earlier prose chronicle in the Porāṇattakathā in Sinhalese,⁵ which had formed also the basis of the Abhidhamma commentaries.

Mahānāma's chronicle is closed, like the Dīpavamsa, with the reign of Mahāsena. R. Siddhārtha (I.H.Q., VIII, 3, pp. 426ff.) is not right in holding that the Pali Mahāvamsa (Mahānāma's work) stops abruptly in the middle of the 37th Chapter without concluding it in the usual way. The concluding chapters of the Dīpavamsa and Mahāvamsa composed by Mahānāma ended in the same way with the same two reflective verses, if both the works were concluded with an account of the reign of Mahāsena:

'Asādhusaṃgamen'evaṃ yūvaṇṇaṃ subhāsubhaṃ katvā gato yathākanumaṃ so Mahāsenaubhūpati.
Tasmā asādhusaṃsaggaṃ ūrakā parivajjiya ahim vāsīvisaṃ khippaṃ kareyy'attahitaṃ budho.'

(Cūlavamsa, Chap. 37, vv. 51-52.)

¹ B. M. Barua, Ceylon Lectures, p. 99.

² G. Turnour's Ed. and Eng. Tr., Ceylon, 1837; H. Sumaṅgala and Baṭuwantolawe, Mahāvamsa, Colombo, 1883; Geiger, Mahāvamsa (P.T.S.) and Tr. by him (published by P.T.S.); Kambojān Mahāvamsa in J.H.A.S., 1902; J.P.T.S. (1902-1903); I.H.Q., Vol. VIII, No. 3; Wijesinha, Sinhalese Tr., Colombo, 1889; Eng. Tr. by L. C. Wijesinha, published in 1909.

³ Paṇḍapattappakāsini, II, p. 657. ⁴ Ibid., I, pp. 41f. ⁵ Ibid., I, p. 36.

When Mahānāma's work was continued by a later chronicler, Dhammakitti, these two verses occur in the middle of the Chapter 37 instead of at the end. The essential point is that each chapter is expected to conclude with one or more reflective verses. In Chapter 37 of Mahānāma's work the concluding verses were evidently taken from the earlier chronicle. It is justly claimed to have been an improvement on an earlier work: The drawbacks of the earlier work, as pointed out in the introductory verses, are all applicable to the Dīpavaṃsa.¹ Comparing the two chronicles, we cannot but come to the conclusion that one is the later remodelled version of the other. A typical example may suffice here to indicate the relation between the two works:

*Piṭakattayapāliṇ ca tassā aṭṭhakatham pi ca |
mukhapāṭhena ānesuṃ pubbe bhikkhū mahāmatī ||
hāniṃ diṣvāna sattānaṃ tadā bhikkhū samāgatā |
ciraṭṭhitatthaṃ dhammassa potthakesu likhāpayuṃ ||*

Dīpavaṃsa, XX, 21-22.

*Piṭakattayapāliṃ ca tassā aṭṭhakatham pi ca |
mukhapāṭhena ānesuṃ pubbe bhikkhū mahāmatī ||
hāniṃ diṣvāna sattānaṃ tadā bhikkhū samāgatā |
ciraṭṭhitatthaṃ dhammassa potthakesu likhāpayuṃ ||*

Mahāvaṃsa, XXXIII, 100-101.

In the instance cited above, the same tradition is narrated in two identical Pali verses. But there are certain traditions in the Mahāvaṃsa which differ from those in the earlier chronicle, e.g. the legend of Tissarakkhā and last days of Asoka; that of conversion of Asoka to Buddhism by Nigrodha, the posthumous son of Asoka's elder stepbrother Sumana, described as a novice of seven years of age; the description of Suvannabhūmi as a country on a sea-shore, which was under the sway of a terrible rākkhasī. These are all conspicuous by their absence in the earlier chronicle.

The six later Indian Buddhist sects which find mention in the Dīpavaṃsa (v. 54) are also found in the general introduction to the Kathāvatthu Commentary. They are referred to also in the body of the latter work. The earlier Pali Chronicle is unaware of the two Sinhalese sects, the Dhammarucī and Sāgaliyā, occurring in the Mahāvaṃsa (v. 13). They are conspicuous by their absence also in the Kathāvatthu Aṭṭhakathā and other works of Buddhaghosa:

¹ Geiger, Dīpavaṃsa and Mahāvaṃsa, pp. 17ff.

*Hemavatikā Rājagirikā Siddhatthā Pubbāparaselikā |
aparo Rājagiriko chaṭṭhā uppannā aparāparā |*

Dīpavaṃsa, v. 54.

*Hemavatā Rājagiriya tathā Siddhatthakā pi ca |
Pubbaseliyabhikkhū ca tathā Aparaseliyā |
Vājiriya, cha ete pi Jambudīpamhi bhinnakā |
Dhammaruci Sāgaliyā Laṅkādīpamhi bhinnakū |*

Mahāvamsa, vv. 12-13.

The Mahāvamsa nowhere says how they had originated and when. It speaks indeed of the first development of the Mahāvihāra and the Abhayagirivihāra into two rival schools.¹ The account of their origin is given in the Mahāvamsa-Tikā and the Nikāyasamgraha. Both the Pali Chronicles connect the mischievous activities of Mitta, Soṇa and other injudicious persons with the reign of Mahāsona.² Judged by the tradition in the earlier Pali Chronicle, the rise of the two Sinhalese sects, called Dhammaruci and Sāgaliyā, occurred in post-Mahāsona times.

The Mahāvamsa must have obtained the legend of Tissarakkhā and Aśoka's last days from an Indian source presupposed by the Divyāvadāna narrative of Aśoka. We say 'presupposed', because the narrative in the Pali great Chronicle is lacking in the legend of Kuṇāla.³

We have so far differed from Oldenberg as to the relative chronological positions of the Dīpavaṃsa and the Sihalaṭṭhakathā Mahāvamsa. In his opinion, the two works, viz. the Dīpavaṃsa and the Mahāvamsa, were based on the historical introduction to the great commentary of the Mahāvihāra, each of them representing their common subject in its own way, the first work following step by step and almost word for word the traces of the original, the second work proceeding with much greater independence and perfect literary mastery.⁴ The position hitherto taken up by us is that the Dīpavaṃsa, which is a compilation of the traditional sayings of the ancients in verse, is an earlier work presupposed by the Porāṇaṭṭhakathā in Sinhalese, and both of these formed the basis of the Mahāvamsa. The points of difference between the two Pali Chronicles were due to the reliance placed by the latter work on the traditions recorded in the historical introduction to the Sinhalese commentary.

¹ Mahāvamsa, XXXIII, 96-99.

² Dīpavaṃsa, XXII, 67-74.

³ Mahāvamsa, XX, 2-6.

⁴ Oldenberg, Dīpavaṃsa, Introduction, p. 7.

The Mahāvamsa-Tīkā speaks of two recensions of the text, namely one belonging to the Mahāvihāra and the other to the Uttaravihāra or Abhayagiri school. It is from this work that we come to know that Thera Mahānāma who resided in a monastery built for him by the commander-in-chief named Dīghasanda, better Dīghasandana, was the author of the Mahāvamsa.¹ The gifted author himself keeps us entirely in the dark as to his personality and whereabouts. Dīghasandana is traditionally known as a commander-in-chief of Devānampiya Tissa who built a little pāsāda on eight pillars for Mahinda, named Dīghasandasenāpati-pariveṇa after him.² The connection of Mahānāma with this monastery does not, however, enable us to fix the time of the author or the date of the work ascribed to him.

Seeing that both the Mahāvamsa and the Dīpavamsa, as we now have them, are concluded alike with an account of the reign of Mahāsena, it may be presumed that the author of the first-named chronicle and that of the concluding portion of the Dīpavamsa flourished almost in the same age. In the midst of uncertainty, the only traditional basis of chronology is the fact that king Dhātusena (A.D. 460–78) evinced a keen interest in the popularization of the Dīpavamsa. Dhātusena is the only king of Ceylon after Mahāsena who finds an incidental mention in the Mahāvamsa. We are told that king Mahāsena caused a monastery, called Dhātusenapabbata, to be built in the west of Ceylon.³ The christening of this Buddhist foundation as Dhātusenapabbata in Mahānāma's time is palpably an instance of anachronism but this can surely be construed as a fact, which brings us down to the reign of Dhātusena, who caused the monastery originally built by Mahāsena to be restored in his time and named after him. It is equally important to note that the annual Mahinda festival was chosen by the king as the fittest occasion for the edification of the chronicle of the island of Ceylon.

The Thera Mahānāma of the Dīghasandana or Dīghāsana monastery, to whom the Mahāvamsa Tīkā ascribes the Mahāvamsa, appears to have been no other person than the Thera Mahānāma to whom king Moggallāna I (A.D. 496–513), the younger son of Dhātusena, dedicated the Pabbatavihāra

¹ Vamsatthappakāsinī, II, p. 687:

Dighasandasenāpatinā kārapitamahāparivenāvāsina Māhānāmo ti gurūhi gahitanāmadheyyena therena . . . katassa Padyapadoruvamsassa.

² Mahāvamsa, XV, 212f.; Cūlavamsa, XXXVIII, 16.

³ Mahāvamsa, XXXVII, 42: pacchīmāyaṃ Dhātusenapabb.

built by him.¹ On reading between the lines, it becomes apparent that the Thera was a resident of the Dighasandana monastery previous to this dedication and was, therefore, connected more with the reign of Dhātusena.² Mahānāma is described as the maternal uncle of Dhātusena according to the Cūḷavaṃsa. Dhātusena in his early life was initiated as a novice by his maternal uncle who was then a Thera in the Dighasandana monastery.³

The encouragement given by king Dhātusena for the edification of the Dīpavaṃsa must have served as a great impetus to the composition of the Mahāvaṃsa or Padya-padoruvaṃsa in Pali. The writing of a Dīpavaṃsa-Atthakathā may have resulted from the same literary process. At all events the mention in the Mahāvaṃsa of a Pabbatarihāra named after Dhātusena, its restorer, is a fact, which must have an important bearing on the question of the date of its composition.

The date of composition of Mahānāma's chronicle thus arrived at from an internal evidence gives rise to an important question whether Mahānāma's work was concluded with the reign of Mahāsena or it included the whole of the Chapter 37 which now occurs partly in the Mahāvaṃsa proper and partly in the Cūḷavaṃsa. To assume that Mahānāma's work had ended as in Geiger's edition is to admit that it ended abruptly without its usual reflective verses. It is true that the text of Mahānāma's work as in Geiger's edition was precisely before the author of the Vamsatthappakāsinī. If the later composer Dhammakitti continued the chronicle in his own way, there is apparently no reason why he should have extended the Chapter 37 instead of beginning with a new chapter. The date suggested in Mahānāma's work itself leads us to think that it was concluded with an account of the reign of Dhātusena. In other words Mahānāma's chronicle consisted not of 37 chapters but of 38.

(B) Cūḷavaṃsa: The Thera Dhammakitti is traditionally known as the author of the first portion of the Cūḷavaṃsa

¹ Cūḷavaṃsa, XXXIX, 42:

Pabbataṃ tu vihāraṃ so katvā therassa dāpayi |
Mahānāmasanūmassa Dighāsanarīhāraṃ ||

² This important point is missed by both E. W. Adikaram (Early History of Buddhism in Ceylon, p. 9) and G. C. Mendis (The Pali Chronicles of Ceylon, University of Ceylon Review, Vol. IV, No. 2, pp. 20ff.).

³ Cūḷavaṃsa, XXXVIII, pp. 16-17:

Mātu sodariyo tesam saddho pabbajja vattati |
Dighasandakāṇḍase, Dhātuseno pi mūlvaro ||
santiko tassa pabbajja rukkhamūlāpāhi etadā || representing a continuation of the Mahāvamsa proper. According to Sinhalese tradition, Dhammakitti was a Burmese monk who came to Ceylon during the reign of king Parakkamabāhu II in the thirteenth century A.D.¹

Geiger notices a turning point in the chronicle of the later kings of Ceylon immediately after the description of the reign of Parakkamabāhu I. Thus the first supplement to Mahānāma's great work may be taken to have comprised forty-three chapters (XXXVII–LXXIX).

In the Cūlavamsa itself we have no mention of any Burmese Thera known by the name of Dhammakitti and connected with the reign of Parakkamabāhu I. We have, on the other hand, the mention in it (LXXVI, 32) of a Ceylonese Thera, called Dhammakitti, who was deputed by Parakkamabāhu I as one of the envoys to the then king of Rāmañña, Lower Burma. The Cūlavamsa (LXXXIV, 11) eloquently speaks of the great qualities of a leading Colian Thera known by the same name who came across to Ceylon on an invitation from king Parakkamabāhu II to effect a thorough reform of the Saṅgha. It is difficult to say if he was the author of the first supplement. The consensus of opinion, however, is in favour of regarding him as the monk who wrote the account in the Mahāvamsa from the reign of Mahāseua to that of Parakkamabāhu II.²

The second portion of the Cūlavamsa may be taken to comprise eleven chapters (LXXX–XC). It presents a chronicle of kings from the reign of Vijayabāhu II to that of Parakkamabāhu IV (circa A.D. 1300).³ The identity of the author of this supplement is still unknown. It would seem possible that this was the composition of the erudite Colian Mahāthera, a master of different languages, who came to Ceylon on an invitation from king Parakkamabāhu IV (A.D. 1325–1347?).

The third portion (Chs. 91 to 100) brings the chronicle down to the reign of Kittī-Siri-Rājasīha (A.D. 1767–1782), the last independent king of Ceylon. The Thera Tibbotuvāve Sumaṅgala is traditionally known as its author, while the concluding chapter bringing the history of Ceylon down to A.D. 1815 was added by Hikkaḍuve Siri-Sumaṅgala.⁴

In adopting the title of Cūlavamsa for the continuation of Mahānāma's work Geiger seeks to justify it on two authorities: (1) a statement in the Cūlavamsa, Chapter 99,

¹ Cūlavamsa, edited by Geiger, Introduction, p. iii.

² J.R.A.S., 1896, pp. 202ff.

³ Geiger, Cūlavamsa, Introduction, p. iv.

⁴ Malalasekera, Dictionary, sub voce Cūlavamsa, I, p. 901.

v. 76, and (2) a statement in the Sinhalese Rājāvalīya.¹ The two statements are found on a proper examination to be of the same import. Both propose to divide the kings of Ceylon into those of the Mahāvamsa meaning the great dynasty and those of the Cūlavamsa, i.e. the lesser dynasty. According to the Rājāvalīya the line of the kings of the first dynasty ended with Mahāsena, and the line of the kings of the later dynasty began with Kittī Siri Meghavanna, the son of Mahāsena. The later dynasty is called Cūla or lesser or lower because the pedigree of the kings belonging to it is heterogeneous, being an intermingling between the descendants of those monarchs who brought to the island the sacred Bo-Branch, and those who brought the tooth relic. But this division of the kings of Ceylon cannot be taken as an evidence to prove that the chronicle composed by Mahānāma had ended with the reign of Mahāsena. Here we must bear in mind also the fact that the Dīpavamsa applies the name of Mahārājavamsa only to the Indian kings of the solar race descended from Mahāsammata and Okkāka.

(C) Uttaravihāra Mahāvamsa: The Mahāvamsa Tikā expressly refers to an Uttaravihāra or Abhayagiri version of the Mahāvamsa which differed in some respects from the Mahāvihāra recension. Just one instance of difference between the two recensions is cited in the Tikā,² but there might have been other instances as well, which may be detected in the light of the difference between the two commentaries produced in the two schools, both in Sinhalese. The instance cited in the Tikā is concerned apparently with what is called Mahārājavamsa in the Dīpavamsa.

4 Dīpavamsa Atthakathā—In two contexts³ the Mahāvamsa Tikā has quoted the views of a Dīpavamsa commentary, written probably in Sinhalese. When this was written and by whom—all these are not known. None need be surprised if the writing of this commentary resulted from the encouragement given by king Dhātusena for the improvement of the Dīpavamsa.

5 Mahāvamsa Atthakathās—The Mahāvamsa Tikā has cited the authority of the Sinhalese commentaries on the Mahāvamsa, one belonging to the Mahāvihāra and the other to the Uttaravihāra or Abhayagiri. The latter contained ¹ Cūlavamsa (Geiger's Ed.), Introduction, pp. 15ff.

² Vamsathappakasinī I, p. 134. Uttaravihāravāṇanāma parva Mahāvamsa 87. haasaraṇāṇi puṭṭipaputtakā daddanti-saḥassāni rājāna aḥeṇam teṇam 1 miṭṭhako Maṇusakkā noma rājā, teṇa puṭṭipaputtakā daddanti-saḥassāni rājāna aḥeṇam teṇa miṭṭhako Jayasena's version.

³ Ibid., II, pp. 411, 683.

certain legends, however few, which were not to be found in the former.¹ Some of the additional matters supplied in the Uttaravihāra commentary have been utilized in the Mahābodhivaṃsa, the Mahāvaṃsa Tīkā and the Extended Mahāvaṃsa.

The Mahāvaṃsa Tīkā presupposes two other earlier commentaries, namely, one by Pāsānadīpavāsī Upatissa Thera and the other known as the Gaṇṭhipadavaṇṇanā.

6. Mahābodhivaṃsakathā.—This is another older work which is quoted by name in the Mahāvaṃsa Tīkā. The Pali verse which is cited from this work cannot, however, be traced in the Mahābodhivaṃsa edited by Arthur Strong for the Pali Text Society:

*Mahābodhiṃ pūjissanti Lanke'tasmiṃ narādhipā paccatthikā na himseyyuṃ-esā sambodhidhammatā.*²

By the title, Mahābodhivaṃsakathā, Malalasekera rightly understands a Mahābodhivaṃsa Aṭṭhakathā.³ The question is—is the older work presupposed by the Mahāvaṃsa Tīkā to be identified with the Pali version of the Mahābodhivaṃsa now extant or should it be identified with its earlier Sinhalese form? There is no consensus of opinion as yet on this point. Geiger admits the possibility of the work being 'identical with the Mahābodhivaṃsa, still in existence',⁴ while Malalasekera doubts it. The latter is inclined to think that careful perusal of both the Mahābodhivaṃsa and the Mahāvaṃsa Tīkā shows that the Mahābodhivaṃsa, at least from the point of view of its language, is later than the Mahāvaṃsa Tīkā.⁵

It is certain that although the Pali version is distinctly given the name of Mahābodhivaṃsa, it is, in fact, written in the style of a commentary, with the usual introductory verse:

*Ken'atthena mahābodhi, kassa sambandhinī ca sā?
kim sādhinī abhiṭṭhutā, kena kattha-ppatitthitā?*⁶

The Pali version is claimed to have been a composition of the author on the basis of an older form written by the previous teachers in the Sinhalese idiom for the benefit of the people of Ceylon.⁷

Geiger rightly points out that the verses in the Pali Mahābodhivaṃsa are all taken from the Mahāvaṃsa. Its

¹ Vamsatthappakāsinī, I, pp. 125, 155, 177, 187, 247, 249, 289, 290.

² Ibid., II, p. 412.

³ Ibid., II, p. 412.

⁴ Geiger, The Dipavaṃsa and Mahāvaṃsa, p. 49.

⁵ Vamsatthappakāsinī, I, Introduction, p. cvii.

⁶ Mahābodhivaṃsa, p. 1.

⁷ Pubbacariyakesariṇi Lanūkāvāsinaṃ atthāya Sihalahāsāya ṭhapitaṃ Mahābodhivaṃsaṃ ahaṃ idāni avasesa-desavāsinaṃ subodhaṃ karonṭi . . . Māgadhabhidhānāya . . . vācāya racayanto . . . Mahābodhivaṃsa, p. 1.

direct dependence on the Samantapāsādikā cannot be doubted. The Jātakatthakathā in its present form is clearly presupposed.¹

It may be important, while discussing the date of composition of the Mahābodhivamsa in its Pali form, to note that the work was indebted to the Mahāvihāra version of the older Mahāvamsa Atthakathā in Sinhalese for the names of Kalāsoka's ten sons,² and to the Uttaravihāra or Abhayagiri version of the same for the names of the nine Nanda brothers,³ but not to the Sinhalese Mahābadhivamsakathā.

It does not seem possible that there was a text known by the name of Mahābodhivamsa other than the Mahābodhivamsakathā which, when first written, was written in the style of a commentary.

The Gandhavamsa mentions the Bodhivamsa along with the Dīpavamsa, the Cullavamsa, the Mahāvamsa and the Paṭisambhīdāmagga Atthakathā, and includes Upatissa among the Sinhalese teachers. In the Sāsanaivamsadīpa, on the other hand, Upatissa is definitely mentioned as the author of the Bodhivamsa. It is said that Upatissa undertook to compose the work at the instance of the Thera Dathanāga. One Thera Dathanāga finds respectful mention in the Cūlavamsa (LIV, 36) as a contemporary of king Mahinda IV (A D 956-72), but the connection of Upatissa, to whom the Sāsanaivamsadīpa ascribes the Bodhivamsa, remains hypothetical. One may agree with Geiger if the Sinhalese Mahābodhivamsakathā be regarded as a work written in the last quarter of the tenth century, leaving the question of the date of composition of the Pali work still open.

7 Mahācetiyaivamsa Atthakathā—It is particularly in connection with the Mahāthūpa or Great Dagoba built by king Dutthagāmanī that the Mahāvamsa Tikā refers us for certain important details to an older work, mentioned in one context by the name of the Mahācetiyaivamsa Atthakathā,⁴ and in a second context by that of the Cetiyaivamsa Atthakathā.⁵ Just as by the Bodhivamsa and Mahābodhivamsa the one and the same chronicle is meant, so by the Cetiyaivamsa Atthakathā and Mahācetiyaivamsa Atthakathā was presumably meant one and the same chronicle—the chronicle of the thūpas. Geiger⁶ rightly observes that the Cetiyaivamsa Atthakathā was clearly

¹ Geiger op cit., pp 75ff

² Mahābodhivamsa, p 98. I amsaṭṭhappakāsinī I, p 177: Adhiteśasāra atroyaput 1 dasabhātukā aherum. Tesam paṇa nāmanam Atthakathāyaṃ eva am

³ Ibid., p 98. I amsaṭṭhappakāsinī I, p 177. tesam navannāṇaṃ uppattikā mañ ca Uttaravihāra; kathamāyaṃ eva am

⁴ I amsaṭṭhappakāsinī, II, p 609

⁵ Ibid., II, p 619

⁶ Geiger op cit., p 49

a work on the dagobas of Ceylon. It is to be expected therefore that it stands in closer relation to the Thūpavaṃsa. The Mahāvāṃsa Tīkā admits at the place where it speaks of the Cetiyavaṃsa Atthakathā that the description of the Vessantara Jātaka and the Abhinikkhamana in the Dhātu-gabbha of the Mahāthūpa is here given in detail. The pictorial decoration of the relic cell in the Ruvanaveli Dagoba is in fact fully described in the Thūpavaṃsa. The Mahācetiya-vaṃsa Atthakathā seems to treat especially of the history of the Mahāthūpa built by Duṭṭhagāmaṇi.

Here, precisely as in the case of the Mahābodhivaṃsakathā, we are not to suppose that the work, in spite of its being given the name of a commentary, was preceded by a text called Cetiyavaṃsa or Mahācetiya-vaṃsa. It probably served as a commentary to the Mahāvāṃsa description of the dagobas built in India and Ceylon. This was written in Sinhalese and served as the authoritative basis of the Pali Thūpavaṃsa.

8. Vaṃsatthappakāsinī.¹—This title is employed in Burmese manuscripts for the Pali commentary on the Mahāvāṃsa, while its author himself suggests the double title of Vaṃsatthappakāsinī and Padyapadoruvaṃsassa atthavannanā.² In the Kambodian MSS., however, the work bears the name of Atthakathā Mahāvāṃsa, meaning an Exegetical Chronicle. According to a tradition current in Ceylon, the author of the commentary, too, was a Thera named Mahānāma. Turnour who recorded this tradition was wrongly led to think that probably the author of the text and the author of the commentary were one and the same person. That they were two different persons separated by a considerable interval of time may now be taken for granted.

The scholiast, Mahānāma or whoever else he might have been, often respectfully refers to the author of the text as ācariya. He is acquainted not only with the two recensions of the text, viz. the Mahāvihāra and the Abhayagiri, but also with two different Sinhalese commentaries produced in the two rival schools. He is aware of the variants in the texts presented before him. Among other older works in Sinhalese availed of by him include a Dīpavaṃsa Atthakathā, an Exegetical Mahābodhivaṃsa and an Exegetical Mahācetiya-vaṃsa.

Malalasekera has drawn our attention to the Bodhgayā inscription of the Thera Mahānāma in which the succession of six Theras of Ceylon is traced through Bhara, Rāhula, Upasena (I), Mahānāma (I), Upasena (II) and Mahānāma (II), ¹ Malalasekera has edited it for the P.T.S. in two parts.

² G. P. Malalasekera, Vaṃsatthappakāsinī, I, Introduction, p. vii.

the last-named Thera being the author of the epigraph. Apart from other cogent details, this is nothing but a string of names without any bearing on the author of the Mahāvamsa Tīkā or his time.¹

The compliment paid to Dhātusena for certain pious constructions may be interesting as suggesting that the work could not have been written previous to the reign of this king.² This does not, however, lead us very far towards the solution of the problem, the name of Dhātusena occurring as well in the Mahāvamsa itself.³

The change of certain place-names noticed in the commentary, e.g. that of the Issarasamanārāma into Kassapagiri-vihāra, with Kassagiri, Kaṇḍagiri, Kandaragiri, Kassakagiri or Vessagiri as its variants, or that of Sāmagalla into Moragalla, is not a decisive fact at all.

There is no better way of fixing the date of compilation of the Mahāvamsa Tīkā than one suggested by Geiger. In the first place the reference made to Bhāginoyya-Dāthopatisa who is no other than Dāthopatisa II (A.D. 664-73) helps us to fix the upper limit. As for the lower limit, one may take these two facts into consideration: (1) that the author of the commentary is unaware of the Extended Mahāvamsa and the first supplement to the Mahāvamsa by Dhammakitti; (2) that it is utilized in the Pali Thūpavamsa composed in the middle of the thirteenth century and must therefore have been earlier than the latter. These facts have led Geiger to place the date of compilation of the Tīkā between A.D. 1000 and 1250.

9. Dāthāvamsa.⁴—This is the abbreviated title for the Pali chronicle which was known to Dhammakitti, the author of the first part of the Cūlavamsa by the name of *Dāthādātuvamsa*⁵ and which was intended by its author to be called Jinadantadhātuvamsa.⁶ The shorter title, Dāthāvamsa, is adopted in the Gandhāvamsa and Sāsnavamsa. The Thera Dhammakitti is rightly credited with the authorship of the Pali chronicle in its present form in the last-named two Pali works written in Burma. The name of Dhammakitti is fittingly mentioned in the closing verses of the work as its illustrious author. In them, he is described as a pupil of the

¹ Vamsatthappakāsinī, I, Introduction, pp. civff.

² Ibid., II, p. 626.

³ Mahāvamsa, XXXVII, 42.

⁴ Vide J.P.T.S., 1886; Devanāgarī Ed. and Tr. by B. C. Law, 1925; J.B.B.R.A.S., XI, 1875; J.A.S.B., 1837; English Tr. by Coomaraswamy, 1874; Academy, Sept. 1874; C. Swamy's Ed. in Sinhalese character; Le Dāthāvamsa: On l'Histoire de la dent relique du Buddha (Gotama), 1881.

⁵ Cūlavamsa, XXXVII, 93; Dāthādātuvamsa vamsanāhi.

⁶ Dāthāvamsa, I, 10; colophon 4.

worthy pupil of the Thera Sāriputta and as the well-known author of a Ṭīkā (Sāratthadīpanī) on the Vinaya Commentary called Samantapāsādikā, a Ṭīkā on the Anguttara Commentary (Manorathapūraṇī), a Ṭīkā on the Candra-vyākaraṇa called the Candrapaṇcīkā, a Pāṇinian treatise on Sanskrit grammar by Candragomin, and a Vinaya compendium known by the name of the Vinayasāṅgraha. He is praised as one of the most erudite scholars who was well-versed in the Tarkaśāstra (systems of Logic) and a master of the doctrine of the Buddha. He was appointed to the coveted office of a Rājaguru (Royal Preceptor) by the reigning king Parakkamabāhu, evidently through the influence of his queen Līlāvatī. The chronicle was written at the instance of Parakkama, then the commander-in-chief of Ceylon, who placed Līlāvatī on the vacant throne of the island.¹ Parakkamabāhu, the husband of Līlāvatī III, was no other than king Parakkamabāhu I (A.D. 1197–1200). Geiger rightly opines that the Pali Dāṭhāvamsa must have been written shortly after Līlāvatī was raised to the throne in A.D. 1211.²

Going by Dhammakitti's own statement, we cannot but admit that his metrical history of the Buddha's tooth-relic was based on an older work in Sinhalese. When this older work was written and by whom is still a matter of speculation. That the Sinhalese original too, was a metrical composition, may be easily inferred from the following description which occurs in Chapter I, verse 10:

Sadesabhāsūya kavīhi Sīhale katam pi vaṃsam Jinadanta-dhātuyā.

According to tradition, the Sinhalese original known as Daḷadāvamsa was written in 845 B.E. and during the reign of Kittī-Siri-Meghavaṇṇa (A.D. 344–362). Kern wrongly calculated this traditional date of composition to be about 310 A.D.³; he could have made out 362 A.D. to be the required date by deducting 483, which was the initial year of the Buddha Era current in Ceylon up till the fifteenth century. But the question arises, is this authentic at all?

The case may be argued thus: We cannot think of a Sinhalese chronicle of the Buddha's tooth-relic before its arrival in the island during the reign of Kittī-Siri-Meghavaṇṇa. Secondly the Dāṭhādihātuvamsa finds mention in the Cūḷavaṃsa (37, 93) in connection with the reign of Kittī-Siri-Meghavaṇṇa.

¹ Dāṭhāvamsa, I, 4–10.

² Geiger, Dīpavamsa and Mahāvamsa, p. 79.

³ Manual of Indian Buddhism, p. 89, f.n. 1.

Dāthādhātussa vaṃsamhi vuttassa vidhinā sa taṃ gahetvā bahumānena katvā sammānaṃ uttamaṃ 1 which may be rendered:

'Receiving it (the tooth-relic) with great honour and doing it the best kind of honour in accordance with the prescribed rule as described in the Dāthādhātuvāṃsa.'

But reading between the lines, one cannot fail to notice that the statement does not prove at all the date of composition of the Sinhalese original. The Pali chronicle was well-known in Ceylon in the time of Dhammakitti, the author of the first part of the Cūḷavaṃsa. All that he wants to say is that the mode of worship of the tooth-relic followed by Kitti-Siri-Moghavanna was similar to the description in the Dāthāvaṃsa then known to him.

Goigor points out that the Sinhalese Daladāpūjāvalī is a later compilation, which closely follows the narrative of the Pali Dāthāvaṃsa.

Lastly, if the Pali version were a faithful reproduction of the older Sinhalese work, its artificial kāvya style alone would have sufficed to place its date of composition after the Mahāvaṃsa.

10. Thūpavaṃsa.—This is the improved Pali version of the traditional history of the Thūpas in India and Ceylon built up till the reign of king Duṭṭhagāmaṇi of Ceylon, the term thūpa meaning a dagoba or relic-shrine (dhātu-cetiya). Strictly speaking, the description given was meant for the Mahāthūpa caused to be built by king Duṭṭhagāmaṇi at Anurādhapura, the traditional account of other thūpas being given by the way:

*Yasmiṃ sayiṃsu jina-dhātuvārū samantū, chabbanna-raṃsi visarehi samujjalantū;
nimmāya loka-hita-hetu janassa rūpaṃ, taṃ thūpaṃ abbhūtataṃ sīrasū namitvā.*¹

In the colophon, too, the chronicle is described as Thūpa-varassa vaṃso, 'The history of the Great Thūpa'.

The author of this version of the Pali Thūpavaṃsa is introduced in the colophon as the Thera Vācissara who was appointed by king Parakkamabāhu to the office of the Librarian of the Royal Library (Dhammāgāra). He is also described as the author of the Līnatthadīpanī Tikā, a sub-commentary on the Paṭisambhidāmagga, the Saccasaṅkhepa-atthadīpanā and the Vissuddhimagga-saṅkhepa-atthappakāśinī.

¹ Thūpavaṃsa, edited by H. C. Law, p. 1.

In the Cūlavamsa, the same Thera Vācissara finds mention as the leading Thera of the island of Lāṅkā of his time, who lived in the time of king Vijayabāhu III, father of Parakkamabāhu II. Vācissara led the deputation of the Theras of Ceylon sent to the kingdoms of Pāṇḍya and Coḷa for the search of the Buddha's tooth-relic and bowl.¹

According to the colophon, Vācissara undertook to compile the Dhātuvamsa at the instance of a Venerable Thera who made the request to him while he was staying at the Mahindasena monastery. The name of the suppliant is not, however, given.

The Pali *Thūpavamsa*² in its present form presupposes an older Pali version and a still older Sinhalese version. There are a few minor points of disagreement between the Sinhalese Thūpavamsa and Vācissara's chronicle. Unfortunately the names of the authors of the Sinhalese Thūpavamsa and the older Pali version are unknown. The Extended Mahāvamsa expressly mentions the Buddhāvamsa, the Mahāvamsa, the Līnattha and the Thūpavamsa as previous authorities on which its history was based.³ This Thūpavamsa must have been an older work, inasmuch as the Līnattha (Līnatthadīpanī) is evidently a sub-commentary on the Paṭisambhidāmagga.

11. Haṭṭhavanagallavihāravamsa.—This, as its name implies, is a Pali traditional history of the Haṭṭhavanagalla monastery erected by Goṭṭhābhaya-Meghavanna and repaired by Parakkamabāhu II. The monastery is said to have been built on the spot where king Siri-Saṅghabodhi gave away his head to a poor man. The chronicle which was written in the middle of the thirteenth century⁴ offers us a full account of the life of Sirisaṅghabodhi.

12. Nalātadhātuvamsa.—This is the Pali original of the Sinhalese Dhātuvamsa written by the Thera Kakusandha. The name and age of the author of this chronicle are as yet unknown.⁵

13. Later Sinhalese Chronicles.—Now turning to the later chronicles written in Sinhalese, we have got to consider the chronological position of the Thūpavamsa, Pūjāvalī,

¹ Cūlavamsa, LXXXI, 20-23.

² Vide P.T.S. Ed. by B. C. Law (1935); Sinhalese Ed. by Dhammaratana, 1896; J.R.A.S., 1898; English Tr. by B. C. Law (Legend of the Topes, Bibliotheca Indica Series, 1945).

³ G. P. Malalasekera, Extended Mahāvamsa (Royal Asiatic Society, Ceylon Branch), XXXVIII, 15.

⁴ Wickremasinghe, Catalogue of Sinhalese Manuscripts, pp. 70-71.

⁵ Geiger, Dīpavamsa and Mahāvamsa, p. 91.

Daladāpūjāvalī, Dhātuvam̐sa, Nikāyasaṅgraha, Rājaratnākara and Rājāvalī.

(a) Thūpavam̐sa: As compared with the Pali version of this chronicle, its Sinhalese version contains more details, and may, in many respects, be regarded as an extended paraphrase of the former. But it seems that the author of the Sinhalese work made also use of the older Sinhalese history of the dagoba on which the Pali version was based. 'The Jātaka Nidānakathā is here also used as the basis for the introduction, the Samantapāsādikā for the history of Asoka and the missions sent out under him, especially that of Mahinda and the Mahāvam̐sa for the rest. Unquestionably the Mahāvam̐sa Tikā was also made use of occasionally.' These facts have led Geiger to conclude that if the Pali Thūpavam̐sa were written in about 1250, the later Sinhalese version of the chronicle must have been produced shortly after that, and shortly before 1260 A.D.

(b) Pūjāvalī: The Thera Mayūrapāda is known as the author of the Pūjāvalī, who was a contemporary of the Thera Dhammakitti, the author of the first supplement to the Mahāvam̐sa. Mayūrapāda may accordingly be assigned to the second half of the thirteenth century.¹

(c) Daladā Pūjāvalī: This is the Sinhalese version of the history of the tooth-relic which closely follows the text of the Pali Dāṭhāvam̐sa. The name of Parakkamabāhu IV is mentioned among the princes noted for the homage paid to the tooth-relic. This Parakkamabāhu who ascended the throne in about 1325 A.D. is said to have written the Dāṭhādihātu-cāritta, a Sinhalese work on the ceremonial of the tooth-relic.² It seems most probable that the Daladā Pūjāvalī was written in the reign of this king who is referred to in the work as 'apage Siri-Parākramabāhu', our (king) Siri-Parākramabāhu.³

(d) Dhātuvam̐sa: The Sinhalese Dhātuvam̐sa written by the Thera Kakusandha is evidently a faithful paraphrase of the Pali Nalāṭa-dhātuvam̐sa. There is no certainty as yet about the age in which Kakusandha lived and wrote his work.

(e) Nikāyasaṅgraha: It is a traditional history of Buddhism in India and Ceylon written by the Mahāthera Jayabāhu surnamed Dōvarakkhita who was famous as Dharmakīrti with special reference to the Buddhist sects. His teacher, Dharmakīrti, was an illustrious monk who caused to be built a vihāra called Saddhammatilaka in the village known by the name of Gaḍalādeniya when king Bhuvanekabāhu was reigning in the city of Gaṅgasiripura. The chronicle was written in the reign of Vīrabāhu II. The Nikāyaśaṅgraha tells us that in the twentieth year of the reign of Bhuvanekabāhu V (A.D. 1396), his cousin, prince Vīrabāhu became king, most probably of the central part of Ceylon, as Vīrabāhu II. It places the accession of king Parākramabāhu II in 1809 B.E. or A.D. 1266. It tells us also that Alakeswara, evidently a minister to king Bhuvanekabāhu V, was the builder of the new Jayavardhanapura on the site of a village called Daragamuwa (Dvāragāma).¹

¹ Geiger, op. cit., pp. 84ff.

² Malalasekera, Dictionary, II, p. 151.

³ Geiger, op. cit., p. 82.

(f) Saddharmaratnākara: It is another traditional history of Buddhism written in Sinhalese shortly after the period represented by the Nikāyaśaṅgraha. A clear idea of its date of composition may be gathered from the fact that in it Vīrabāhu is said to have been preceded in his office by his brother Vīra Alakeswara, and earlier by a son of Alakeswara the Viceroy. Vīrabāhu was succeeded in his office by two others previous to the return of his brother, Vīra Alakeswara from India. According to the Saddharmaratnākara his successor was a prince of the Mehenavaravaṃsa and was Epāṇa, a fact which finds its corroboration in the Chinese chronicles stating that Vīrabāhu was succeeded on the throne by his son Parākramabāhu Epāṇa meaning Parākramabāhu VI.²

(g) Attanagaluvaṃsa: This is the Sinhalese translation of a Pali work, Attanogaruvaṃsa, which was dedicated to the General Satrusinha Kuñjara, brother of Alakeswara, prime minister to king Bhuvanekabāhu V. The Mayūrasandesa was a contemporary Sinhalese poem in which both king Bhuvanekabāhu V and his viceroy Alakeswara find an incidental mention.³

(h) Rājaratnākara: It contains a traditional history of the kings of ancient India and Ceylon written by Walgampoya Terunnanse probably in about the middle of the sixteenth century. There are reasons to believe that the author of this Sinhalese chronicle made use of both the Pūjāvalī and the Nikāyaśaṅgraha.⁴

(i) Rājāvalī: This is the latest known traditional history of the kings of ancient India and Ceylon which as a whole may be treated as the work of a single individual. The fact

¹ Nikāyaśaṅgraha, translated by C. M. Fernando, pp. xivff.

² Ibid., Introduction, p. xviii.

³ Fernando, op. cit., Introduction, p. xvi.

⁴ Geiger, op. cit., pp. 95ff.

that its account closes with the reign of Vimala Dhamma Suriya (A.D. 1679-1701) has led Geiger to take it to be a compilation of the beginning of the eighteenth century.¹

14. Vuttamālā.—This is a Pali poem written in the reign of Parakkamabāhu VI, in praise of this very king, whose 'long and glorious reign covering over half a century' was the brightest period in the national annals nearest to the advent of the Portuguese'.²

¹ Geiger, op. cit., p. 94.

² Fernando, op. cit., Introduction, p. xviii.

CHAPTER II

LITERARY POSITION

The history of the Vaṃsa literature is fairly old in India. The word vaṃsa or vaṃśa itself was taken to mean tanti (lineage), which is just another word for anvaya. All the three words carry with them the idea of paramparā or lineal succession. Among the Brāhmaṇas, we have one bearing the title of Vaṃśa-Brāhmaṇa, which contains the lineal succession of the Brahman teachers of old. Such vaṃśas are appended to some of the chapters of the Bṛhad Āraṇyaka Brāhmaṇa Upaniṣad. So far as the Pali Canon is concerned, the Buddhavaṃsa is the only work which bears the vaṃsa title. Here, too, we have just a lineage of the greatest known teachers of mankind. The Buddhavaṃsa, which offers a traditional history of twenty-four Buddhas, including Gotama the historical Buddha, was supplemented later by the Anāgatavaṃsa, an ex-canonical work dealing with the legendary life of Metteyya the Future Buddha. Within the Pali Canon, the Buddhavaṃsa which is throughout a metrical composition of the chronicle type was preceded by a Buddhāpadāna (Buddhāvadāna) in the Mahāpadāna Suttaṇṭa. The Buddhavaṃsa itself has the Apadāna as companion work in verse. The Buddhavaṃsa, Apadāna and Cariyā Piṭaka are the three companion works which are to be counted among the latest additions to the Khuddaka Nikāya.

As between the Vaṃsa and the Apadāna which have narratives in common, we can do no more than drawing a broad distinction, premising that the main interest of the former lies in setting forth the lineage or succession, while the latter is primarily concerned with the edification of the tradition of meritorious and memorable deeds.

Corresponding to the lives of the Buddhas and those of the Theras in the Buddhavaṃsa and the Apadāna respectively, we have in the Jaina Kalpa Sūtra the lives of the Jinas or Tirthaṅkaras and those of the disciples of Mahāvīra.

Both the Vaṃsa Brāhmaṇa and the Vaṃśas in the Bṛhad Āraṇyaka Upaniṣad are in prose. Whether prose had preceded verse or verse prose is still a disputed question. The alternation of prose and verse or of verse and prose is a phenomenon, which recurs even in the history of the Vaṃsa literature of Ceylon.

The earlier Indian prototypes of the Vaṃsa literature, mentioned above, are deficient in so far as they are wanting in the rājavaṃsa or rājaparamparā, while the Vaṃsa literature is mostly built on two paramparās, viz. rāja meaning the succession of kings and thera meaning the succession of elders.

The rājavaṃsas or rājānṛayas were developing in India side by side with the ācariyavaṃsa or ācariyaparamparās. The origin of the former must be traced in the ancient Itihāsas or royal anecdotes, particularly in the pre-Pāṇinian Mahābhārata. The rājavaṃsas or dynastic lists came to form a distinctive feature as much of the Paurāṇic recast of the Mahābhārata as of the Purāṇas themselves. The traditions and lineages of kings in both prose and verse, are met with in the Nikāyas including the Canonical Jātakas. Out of these earlier prototypes emerged the Vaṃsas of Ceylon as a distinct and remarkable type of historical or semi-historical literature.

1. Dīparamsa.—By the consensus of opinion this is the oldest known chronicle of Ceylon written in Pali. This text has been edited and translated by Oldenberg. This is, on the whole, a metrical composition with two prose passages, one of which is based upon a canonical text such as the Vinaya account of the Second Buddhist Council,¹ and the other is modelled evidently on the Jātaka Nidāna-kathā.² Whether these are later interpolations or remnants of the prose texts which were versified afterwards is still a disputed question. From the inclusion of the two prose passages within the present metrical form of the chronicle, no definite conclusion can be drawn either as to its original form or as to its literary position.

Arguing on the authority of the Mahāvamsa Tikā which is the literary product of a much later age, Oldenberg inclines to the view that 'the author of the Dīparamsa borrowed not only the materials of his own work, but also the mode of expression and even whole lines, word for word, from that Aṭṭhakathā' (Sinhalese Aṭṭhakathā Mahāvamsa).³ The same

¹ Dīparamsa, IV, bet. verses 46 and 47:

Tena kho pima samayena vassasatamhi parinibbute Bhagavati Vesālīka Vajjiputtaka bhikkhū Vesālīyā dāsa vatthūni dipenti, etc.

Cf. Vinaya Pīṭaka, II, p. 294.

² Dīparamsa, XII, bet. verses 29 and 30:

Mārisa tam pi Bhagavati subhikkho; andhātumaddhāne Mahinda bhikkhū dipam paḍayisati... Here the reminder, Kālo mahācāra dipam paḍidetuṃ, cannot but remind the reader of the stanza:

Kālo nu kho.....

which occurs in the Nidāna-kathā, Jātaka, I, p. 48. Cf. Paramatthadīpani on Therīgāthā (P.T.S.), p. 1.

³ Ibid., p. 6.

line of argument has been followed by Geiger, Malalasekera, and others who have seriously discussed the chronological and literary position of the Dīpavaṃsa in its present form. Apparently this is a very convincing argument, but on a closer examination it would seem that it moves in a vicious circle.

The Sinhalese Aṭṭhakathā Mahāvamsa is mentioned in the Mahāvamsa Tīkā as the basis of the Mahāvamsa proper written by the Thera Mahānāma, a contemporary of Dhātusena and his son and successor, while in fact the Mahāvamsa was chiefly an improvement on the Dīpavaṃsa and its narrative was based upon a somewhat different traditional authority in places where it has differed from the Dīpavaṃsa. For this traditional authority Oldenberg has rightly drawn our attention to the Aṭṭhakathā version of the historical narrative of Mahinda's mission to Ceylon as found in the general introduction to the Vinaya commentary. But he is still guided or misguided by the author of the Mahāvamsa Tīkā when he observes: 'A considerable number of verses ascribed to the Porāṇā, i.e. taken from the ancient Sinhalese Aṭṭhakathā and quoted by Buddhaghosa or in the Mahāvamsa Tīkā, present the same close resemblance and almost identity with passages of the Dīpavaṃsa.'¹

The fact is different. To Buddhaghosa, the celebrated Pali commentator, the Dīpavaṃsa was well known as a Pali chronicle. If the traditional verses quoted in the Samantapāsādikā in the name of the Porāṇā or ancient teachers be found to be identical with those in the Dīpavaṃsa, we are not to suppose that the prose account in the Vinaya Aṭṭhakathā with the verse-quotations inserted in it had formed the Sinhalese basis of the Dīpavaṃsa itself. The conclusion as to that would have been sound if it were the fact that the Samantapāsādikā account tallied entirely with the historical narrative of the Dīpavaṃsa. As already pointed out in the preceding chapter, the prose narrative in the Samantapāsādikā followed a somewhat different tradition in spite of the verse-quotations from the Dīpavaṃsa. Certain traditions recorded by the first-named Buddhaghosa are in accord with those in the Dīpavaṃsa; but these are missed in the narrative of the Samantapāsādikā and in the Mahāvamsa itself.²

When we say this, we do not mean to create the impression that the Dīpavaṃsa as a metrical composition had not for its

¹ Dīpavaṃsa (Oldenberg), Introduction, p. 5.

² Notably the prediction about the noble part to be played by Prince Piyadāsa (i.e. Piyadassana) on his becoming consecrated as king Asoka. Sumaṅgala-vilāsini, II, p. 613.

basis any earlier legendary accounts in prose then available either in Pali or in Sinhalese. All that we mean to say is that the answer to the question regarding the literary position of the Dīpavaṃsa does not lie in the Aṭṭhakathā Mahāvaṃsa as made out from the Samantapāsādikā and the Mahāvaṃsa Tikā; it lies elsewhere.

The Buddhavaṃsa offers us the Pali canonical model for the metrical form of the Dīpavaṃsa: Both the works are composed in an Anuṣṭubh metro and in a simple narrative style. The variation in metro is seldom noticed. Anything approaching real poetry in the Buddhavaṃsa is to be noticed in its introductory verses and Sumedha-kathā, and anything approaching real poetry in the Dīpavaṃsa lies in its introductory verses and a few verses which are composed in a different metro in its first two chapters.

Buddhavaṃsa :

Obhāsītā ca paṭhavi saderakā puthū ca lokantarikā asaṃvutā । tamo ca tibbo vihato tadā ahu disvāna accherakam pāṭihīram । Sadevagandhabbamanussarakkhase ābhā ulārā vipulā ajāyatha । imasmim loke parasmim cobhayasmim adho ca uddham tiriyaṇ ca vitthataṃ ।

Dīpavaṃsa :

Suṇṭha sabbe paṇidhāya mūnasam, vaṃsam pavakkhāmi paramparāgataṃ । thutippasattham bahunābhiraṇṇitam etaṃhi nānākusumam va ganthitam । Anūpamam vaṃsavaraggavāsīnam apubbam anaññaṃ tatha suppakāsitaṃ । ariyāgataṃ ullamasabbhi vaṇṇitam suṇṭha dīpatthuti sādhusakkataṃ ।

Also:

Rammaṃ manuññaṃ haritaṃ suvīlataṃ āramatanarāmaṇeyyakam varam । santīdha phullaphaladhārino dumā, suññaṃ vicittaṃ, na ca loci issaro । mahāṇṇare sāgararārimajjhe sugambhīre ūmi sadū pabhijjare, । suduggame pabbatajātamuṃsite sudukkaram altha anīṭṭhamantarāṃ ।

Here, in the stanzas cited above, is a conscious effort made towards producing the effect of kāvya poetry. Their composer had before him the canonical model in some of the Psalms of the Early Buddhist Brothers and Sisters in the Thera-Therī-gāthā. These, as they stand in the first two chapters of the Dīpavaṃsa, serve to relieve the monotony and dulness of the purely historical narrative of the chronicle. Had such stanzas been introduced also in the remaining chapters, the chronicle might have assumed the form of a kāvya. As regards some of the remaining chapters, the compiler has sought to break the monotony of the metrical narration of historical events by introducing certain statements in prose. So far as the narrations in the colourless Anuṣṭubh metre are concerned, they were modelled evidently on the traditional sayings in verse then current in the community indefinitely in the name of the Porāṇas or Ancient Teachers.

With Geiger the Dīpavaṃsa represents the first unaided struggle to create an epic out of already existing material.¹ He is inclined also to think that the Dīpavaṃsa closely resembles in form the ancient Ākhyāna poetry of India, the characteristic feature of which lies in this that the entire story is not yet established in a form, but only certain parts are metrically fixed and thereby are secured from further departure from the tradition. This chronicle was evidently the production of an age when with the decline of oral tradition, the same stories came to show many variants, together with many examples of identity of language.²

The question still remains—can the Dīpavaṃsa in its present form be judged at all as an epic? To be an epic, it must have a narrative interweaving several episodes into a unity, showing the dramatic junctures and conveying a central idea or moral; its theme, too, must be lofty and of heroic character, and above all, there must be a hero whose exploits it must narrate in an effective manner.

So far as the narrative of the Dīpavaṃsa is concerned, the historical motive predominates over the poetical. The heroes, too, are not one but many. Its main theme is Laṅkā-vijaya, the conquest of Laṅkā, both culturally and politically, first, by the Buddha, secondly, by prince Vijaya, and thirdly, by the Thera Mahinda. King Devānampiya Tissa and Dutthagāmaṇi were the two great national heroes of Ceylon who served to consolidate the territory-conquered-for the religion of Sākyaṃṇi. Viewed in this light, the narrative of the Dīpaṃsa is a combination of as many as five epics. The Mahāvaṃsa closes each of its chapters with the pathetic reflection setting forth the evanescent character of the kingly career and dynastic rule and emphasizing the value of the meritorious deeds that only endure.¹ This kind of reflection constituting the central idea or moral of the Mahāvaṃsa is met with once at the end of the Mahārājavaṃsa section of the Dīpaṃsa forming the epic kernel, and next at the end of the concluding chapter:

¹ Geiger, The Dīpavaṃsa and Mahāvaṃsa, p. 2.

² Ibid., p. 11.

*Aniccā rata saṃkhārā uppādayadhammino |
uppajjitvā nirujjhanti, tesam rūpasamo sukho |*²

*Asādhusaṃgamen'eva yāvajīvaṃ subhūsubhaṃ |
katvā gato yathākammaṃ so Mahāsenabhūpati |
Tasmā asādhusaṃsaggaṃ ārakū parivajjīya |
ahiṃ vāsīrisaṃ vāsi karēyy'atthahitaṃ bhava |*³

It will be seen that the moral at the end of the Mahārājavaṃsa section is not an original composition but a stanza taken over from the Mahāparinibbāna Sūtantā, Chapter VI, and that at the end of Chapter XXII, too, it is just an adaptation to the traditional moral met with in the Jātakas.

The main drawbacks of the earlier Pali chronicle as regards its mode of narration of events lie, as pointed out by the author of the Mahāvaṃsa, in the fact that it is in some places too diffusivo and in some places too concise, and what is more, it abounds in repetitions.

Judged from the point of view of poetry, its main defect, as suggested in the opening verses of the Mahāvaṃsa, consists in its failure to kindle faith and to call up emotion in right places (pasādaṇake thāne tathā saṃvegakūrake).

These points of criticism should, however, be considered, first of all, with reference to the earlier form of the Dīpaṃsa in which its principal themes were Buddha's visits to Ceylon, the conquest of the island by Prince Vijaya, the origin of the Buddhist sects and schools of thought, and the establishment of the Buddhist Orders by Mahinda and Saṅghamittā.

So far as this earlier form of the chronicle is concerned, its author openly claims that his performance is capable of awakening emotional interest, pleasing and delighting the heart of the reader, and what is more, the narrative of his epic is replete with various forms and modes:

¹ Cf. Barua, Ceylon Lectures, p. 280.

² Dīpaṃsa, III, 50.

³ I-I-I, XXII, 75-76.

pīti-pāmojja-jananam pasādeyyam manoramam anekākārasampannam.....

That there is lack of symmetry here and there is undeniable. The events are not narrated in one and the same strain. The result produced is, on the whole, a piece of mosaic. But therein exactly lies its rugged beauty and grandeur. The repetitions complained of are there, but that is more apparent than real. Let us take, for instance, the account of the First Buddhist Council which occurs twice in the Dīpavaṃsa, first, in Chapter IV and, again, in Chapter V. On looking more closely into the matter, however, we find that in the first instance the author is to offer us a description of the Council concerned as an isolated incident, considered per se, and in the second context it is presented as an integral part of the whole of the historical narrative. The same as to the description of the Second Buddhist Council. The so-called repetitions are not unjustified.

The narration of events from the reign of the immediate successor of Devānaṃpiya Tissa to that of Mahāsenā is dominated by purely historical motive. The strain of continuous narration is nowhere sought to be relieved. The thread of the narrative is loose and the accounts in places are too concise to produce a lasting effect. It is not unlikely that the four or five concluding chapters were later additions.

2. Aṭṭhakathā Mahāvaṃsa.—The Sinhalese original of this work being irrevocably lost, its literary position depends on its Pali versions in the commentaries attributed to Buddhaghosa, notably, the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, the Aṭṭhasālinī, the Kathāvatthu-aṭṭhakathā and the Samantapāsādikā. The historical matters are mostly to be found in the general introduction and rarely in the body of the commentaries. The accounts are in prose interspersed with traditional verses cited either from the Dīpavaṃsa or current in the name of the ancient teachers (Porāṇā). Strangely enough, the verses traceable in the Dīpavaṃsa are attributed to the Porāṇas in the Mahāvaṃsa Tīkā, while the verse-quotations from the Porāṇas which are met with in the Pali canonical commentaries stand altogether on a different footing, and so far as their style of composition is concerned, they represent a stage of literary development anterior to that of the Dīpavaṃsa.

The general introduction to the Kathāvatthu-aṭṭhakathā goes to show that the statement in prose is based upon the metrical account cited in extenso from the Dīpavaṃsa. The description of the First Buddhist Council given by Buddhaghosa in the general introduction to his Sumaṅgalavilāsinī is based partly on the Vinaya account in the Cullavagga, Chapter XI, and partly on a later tradition. Here the prose style of Buddhaghosa is laboured, heavy and pedantic. The case is somewhat different when we read the general introduction to the Vinaya Atthakathā where the author writes with comparative ease and his mode of presentation of the subject is characterized by lucidity and spontaneity. Here the prose style is well suited to a purely historical narrative. The Legends of Asoka, as narrated in the Divyāvadāna, show a conscious effort for producing a poetical effect.

3. Mahāvamsa.—This work certainly stands as a masterpiece produced by the poetically gifted Thera Mahānāma in the Vamsa literature of Ceylon. It is undoubtedly the more finished product of the literary and poetical art employed in the earlier works of the same type, particularly in the Dīpavamsa. It is not unreasonably judged as the national epic of Ceylon with Duṭṭhagāmaṇi as its chief hero. Kalhaṇa's Rājatarāṅgiṇī and the anonymous Mūlakaḥpa are two later Sanskrit chronicles in verse which are without the epic touch of the Mahāvamsa. Firdausi's Shāhnāmāh, which occupies a high place in the world of epics, is a similar chronicle of the ancient kings of Iran. Just as Firdausi's masterpiece was in one sense the completed form of the chronicle left unfinished by Dāqiqi, so in another sense Mahānāma's masterpiece may be regarded as the developed form of the Dīpavamsa as regards its four or five concluding chapters. Malalasekera says, 'Mahānāma was no genius, he was too much hide-bound by tradition, and his work cannot rank as a literary performance of the first order.'¹ But it is contended that it may not be an epic of as high literary merit as Vālmiki's Rāmāyaṇa, Sauti's Mahābhārata or Firdausi's Shāhnāmāh. It is an epic throughout with a keen sense of history, the simplicity of diction, the purity of style and the sobriety of judgement. Its central idea or moral looms large at the end of each chapter. The national mind, self-consciousness and character have found a permanent expression in it.²

In claiming the superiority of artistic workmanship in his treatment of one and the same theme, the author of the Mahāvamsa was compelled to point out the drawbacks in the earlier chronicle. Repetitions, diffuseness and unmethodical representation are the three main faults in the earlier work which he consciously sought to avoid in his own composition and presentation. While commenting on this literary position of Mahānāma's work, Geiger rightly observes: 'The Mahāvamsa compared with the Dīpavamsa has every claim to be regarded as a work of art. The story proceeds in it in a logical manner, without inconvenient breaks or repetitions. It runs parallel with the Dīpavamsa at times in such a way that whole episodes in both epics are evidently two different versifications of the same material. But the Mahāvamsa amplifies and supplements the Dīpavamsa, or else represents the subject in a more concise manner. The greater ability is shown in the handling of speech and metre in the Mahāvamsa in contrast to the Dīpavamsa . . . Also the niceties of diction, especially the play upon words, is more evident in the Mahāvamsa than in the Dīpavamsa. To sum up, we notice everywhere in the Mahāvamsa the hand of a poet, working deliberately, lingering over his material, and endeavouring to clothe it in suitable form.'¹

¹ Pali Literature of Ceylon, p. 141.

² Ceylon Lectures, p. 160.

Notwithstanding this fact, looking more closely into the matter, one cannot help saying that the whole foundation of the great national epic of Ceylon was laid in the earlier chronicle. The Dīpavamsa adopted, as we saw, its own literary and poetical devices. It had different heroes in the successive stages of its narrative, while the Mahāvamsa came to shift its emphasis and lay it on Duṭṭhagāmaṇi. The diction of the Mahāvamsa was modelled evidently on the concluding chapters of the Dīpavamsa. The Mahāvamsa would have been a poem written in high strain and its effect would have been monotonous and tiresome but for the fact its author broke the monotony and relieved the tension by his indulgence in reflective poetry at the end of each chapter, and wisdom in effecting a change in metre.

4. Extended Mahāvamsa.—The extended Mahāvamsa is nothing but a later enlarged version or recension of the poem of Mahānāma. This text has been edited by G. P. Malalasekera in the Aluvihāra series, Vol. III, and published by the Royal Asiatic Society (Ceylon Branch), 1937. Curiously enough, the work is represented in the colophon as one consisting of thirty-five bhāṇavāras or chapters, while the work in its present form contains thirty-seven chapters.

Imāya pañcatimsamattāya bhāṇavārāya ganthato yam etaṃ niṭṭhapentena puññaṃ upacitaṃ mayā

(Colophon).

¹ Dīpavamsa and Mahāvamsa, p. 17.

Moggallāna introduces himself as the author of this work. But apart from the fact that for additional matter the author was indebted to the Buddhavaṃsa, Līnathā and Thūpavaṃsa, the literary position of the work is the same as that of Mahānāma's epic upon which it was based. The reflective stanzas at the end of the chapters are identical in both the versions.

5. Cūlavāṃsa.—If the extended Mahāvāṃsa is an enlarged version of the Mahāvāṃsa written by Mahānāma, the Cūlavāṃsa certainly represents a later continuation of the same. In other words, the Cūlavāṃsa is just a supplement to the Mahāvāṃsa. Though it grew up into its present form through two or three stages, the poet of each stage was careful to maintain the diction and style of Mahānāma. The epic character of the work is sought to be maintained by means of the reflective stanzas with which each chapter is concluded. In going to convey the moral in the concluding stanza of Chapter 100, the later poet appears to have exceeded the limits of reflective poetry by his naive indulgence in an admonition:

Bhoge ca dehe ca asārakattaṃ mantrālayaṃ dūrataraṃ haranti tumhe pi vaṭṭhullayaṃ eva seviya lokuttarādīṃ kusalaṃ bhajavho.

6. Vaṃsatthappakāsini.¹—This is the later convenient name applied to the Pali commentary on the Mahāvāṃsa alias Padyapadoruvāṃsa written by the Thera Mahānāma II and known by the name of Padyapadoruvāṃsarayṇanā and Vaṃsatthappakāsini. In the author's own description the work was not a mere translation from any earlier Sinhalese Aṭṭhakathā; it was rather a digest (atthasāraṃ) of earlier works carefully prepared in the diction of the Pali Canon (tanṭinayānurūpena). The main earlier works utilized by him consisted of (1) the text of the Mahāvāṃsa in its two recensions, (2) the Aṭṭhakathā Mahāvāṃsa, (3) two Sinhalese commentaries on the Mahāvāṃsa, viz. those belonging to the Mahāvihāra and Abhayagiri fraternities, (4) the Samantapāsādikā, (5) the Dīpavaṃsa Aṭṭhakathā, (6) the Jātaka Nidāna-kathā, (7) the Sahasavallī-aṭṭhakathā, (8) the Mahā-bodhivaṃsa-aṭṭhakathā, (9) the Gaṇṭhipadattavarṇanā, and (10) the Sīhalanāmakkāra-rayṇanā.

The prose style of the commentary is simple and lucid; it is hardly involved or ornate. There are only two or three ornamental passages, as pointed out by Malalasekera, who particularly draws our attention to the description of the Mahāmeghavāna (72, 11ff.) and the passage on the scenic beauties of Ceylon (321, 3ff.).¹ It appears that the graphic description of Ceylon is modelled on the Milinda description of the Yona city of Sāgala and partly also on Buddhadatta's description of the port of Kāveripaṭṭana: *tattha tattha sannivesita - gāmanigama - nagara - janapada - rājadhānī - vāpi - talākapokkharanī - uyyānabhūmippadesehi - pavaraṅgapaccanī - ga - rūpissariya - samannāgatāya sampannasālilāsayaṣaṇvaḍ - dhapupphaphalapallava - vicittataruvanagahana - racita . . .*²

¹ Edited for the Government of Ceylon by G. P. Mahipala in two volumes and published by the P.T.S., London (1935).

The following two stanzas composed by the author distinctly betray the influence of later artificial kāvya poetry:

*Budhajanapadumaravibhūtanuttaro
Vararavikulambarapabhāsītuttamo
Saddhammakiraṇakaravaratejasā yo Mohandhakārahananamhi mahānubhāvo.*³

7. Mahābodhivaṃsa.—The *Mahābodhivaṃsa*⁴ has been written with freedom and prolixity common to Buddhist writers. The author of this work has borrowed largely from the sources as well as from the Mahāvāṃsa text. There is enough evidence to show that the author has made use of other materials as well. The chapters relating to the three Councils and the rehearsal of the Law are similar not only to the Buddhist account in the introduction to the Sumaṅgala-vilāsinī but also to that in the Saddhammasaṅgaha. As regards the description of Mahinda's adventures after his arrival in Laṅkā, the Mahābodhivaṃsa and the Samantapāsādikā are in agreement.

The Pali text of the Mahābodhivaṃsa is a translation of a Sinhalese original. It tells us nothing about its author. According to the Sāsanavaṃsadīpa, Upatissa was its author.

Upatissamahāthero Māgadhāya niruttiyā Bodhivaṃsaṃ akā dhīro dhīrehi abhivaṇṇiyam.

The Gandhavaṃsa points out that the Mahābodhivaṃsa was written independently by its author. The style is easy and the language is lucid.

¹ Vamsatthappakāsinī, Intro., p. cvii.

² Cf. Milinda, pp. 1-2: Atthi Yonakānam nānāpuṭabhedanam Sāgalaṃ nāma nagaraṃ nadīpabbata sobhitam ramaṇīyabhūmipadesabhāgaṃ āramuyyānopavana talākapokkharanī sampannaṃ nadīpabbatavanarāmaṇeyyakam . . .

Also Buddhadatta's Manuals edited by A. P. Buddhadatta, 1915, preface, p. xiii.

³ Vamsatthappakāsinī, I, p. 1.

⁴ This text has been edited by S. Arthur Strong for the P.T.S. (1891).

8. Thūpavaṃsa.—In the introductory verses the author tells us that the work having at first been compiled in Sinhalese language was not accessible to all. Even the earlier Māgadhi (i.e. Pali) version prepared for the benefit of all was full of defective arrangement and language and it left out many things that ought to have been narrated. In order to remove these defects in the earlier Māgadhi version the author undertook to do the work again.

*Vākyena Sihala-bhāvena 'bhisaṅkhatattā |
atthaṃ na sādhayati sabbajanassa sammā |
Yasmā ca Māgadha-niruttikato 'pi Thūpa- |
vaṃso viruddha-naya-sadda-samākulo so |
vattabban eva ca bahum pi yato na vuttam |
tasmā ahaṃ punapi vaṃsam imam vadāmi |*

Though the earlier Pali text is no longer extant, it is not difficult to estimate the nature of the linguistic improvement effected by Vācissara by comparing his version of the Thūpa-vaṃsa with parallel passages as found in the Samantapāsādikā or the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī.

I. (a) *Devānaṃpiyatisso mahārājū 'pi kko Sumana-sāmaṇerassa vacanena māgasiramāsassa paṭhamapūṭipadadi-vasato pabhuti uttaradvārato paṭṭhāya yāva Jambukolapattanaṃ maggaṃ sodhāpetvā alaṃkārapetvā nagarato nikkhamana-divase.*¹

(b) *Devānaṃpiyatissa-mahārājū 'pi uttaradvārato paṭṭhāya yāva Jambukolapattanaṃ maggaṃ sodhāpetvā alaṃkārapetvā nagarato nikkhamana-divase.*²

II. (a) *Tena ca samayena rūjadhītū Saṅghamittā 'pi tasmim yeva thāneṭhitū hoti tassā ca sāmiko Aggibrahmā nāma kumāro . . . Rājū taṃ divā āha.*³

(b) *Tena ca samayena rūjadhītū Saṅghamittā 'pi tasmim thāneṭhitū hoti, taṃ divā āha.*⁴

The only interesting point to be noticed in the whole work is the setting out of legendary materials having their bearings upon the history of the Thūpas. The Thūpavaṃsa undoubtedly is one of the products of the decadent period of Pali literature in Ceylon. It is lacking in originality and the atmosphere of life it creates is dull and monotonous. It is a specimen of the stereotyped and highly conventionalized prose of scholastic writings.

9. Dāthāvaṃsa.—The Dāthāvaṃsa is a quasi-religious historical record written with the intention of edifying (pasādasamvegakara) or rousing (somebody's) religious emo-

¹ Samantapāsādikā, I, p. 98.

² Samantapāsādikā, I, p. 31.

³ Thūpavaṃsa, p. 53.

⁴ Thūpavaṃsa, p. 62.

tions. It bears many marks of the fairy tale. It is remarkable because it shows us Pali as a medium of epic poetry. In it the character of classical Pali is well retained, although the Sanskrit education of its author has left its stamp on its style. We find the old vocabulary enriched by adapted Sanskrit words; single expressions are turned into long compounds¹ after the fashion of the Sanskrit kāvya literature. Such words as antarāla, avadāta, āmōda, nikkhila, nūtana, dhavala, occur in large numbers. Some metaphorical expressions are also found there. It is an excellent piece of poetry. Its vocabulary is rich. In the first chapter the verses are written in Jagatī metre, sixty stanzas in Vamśastha, and the last two in Sragdharā. The second chapter is composed of verses in Anuṣṭubh, Pathyavaktra and Mandākrāntā. The third chapter has verses composed of Triṣṭubh, Upajāti, Indravajrā, Upendra-vajrā and Śikhariṇī. The fourth chapter contains verses in Atisarkarī and Śārdūla-vikrīḍita. The last chapter employs Śarkarī, Vasantatilakā and Sragdharā metres.

10. Saddhammasaṅgaha.—The *Saddhammasaṅgaha*² is written in an elegant and simple language. It belongs to the class of manuals and as such it is a mixture of prose and poetry. In most cases the prose portion serves only as an explanation of the subject matter in verse. This work contains many discourses common to the Mahābodhivaṃsa, the Gandhavaṃsa, the Sāsanavaṃsa and the like. The author has borrowed very largely from the actual texts of the Dīpavaṃsa, the Mahāvaṃsa, the Atthakathā and other well-known Pali works which are simply referred to as Porāṇā or ancient authorities. The author refers to many works among which some may be noted here: Sāratthadīpanī or the Atthavaṇṇanā of the Samantapāsādikā, the Vinaya Commentary; the Atthavaṇṇanā of the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, the Dīgha Nikāya Commentary; the Atthavaṇṇanā of the Papañcasūdanī, the Majjhima Nikāya Commentary; the Atthavaṇṇanā of the Sāratthappakāsinī, the Samyutta Nikāya Commentary; the Atthavaṇṇanā of the Manorathapūraṇī, the Anguttara Nikāya Commentary, and the Atthavaṇṇanā of the Atthasālinī, the Dhammasaṅgaṇi Commentary.

11. Later Sinhalese Chronicles.—They are either translations or prose amplifications of the Pali books. They cannot be taken to represent the older Sinhalese works presupposed by the Pali compilations. The prose style of the Sinhalese Dhātuvam̐sa was determined entirely by its Pali original, the Nalāṭa Dhātuvam̐sa. Occasional differences in style, as noticed in the Rājāvalī, are evidently due to the fact that 'the author has taken many passages word for word from elder sources'. Those who are better acquainted with the Sinhalese language and literature are competent to judge their style of composition. These later Sinhalese chronicles appear to us as literary productions of a dull and decadent age.

¹ E.g., IV, 46.

² This text has been edited by N. Saddhānanda for J.P.T.S., 1890, and translated into English by B. C. Law entitled 'A Manual of Buddhist Historical Traditions', published by the University of Calcutta (1941).

CHAPTER III

HISTORICAL POSITION

The chronicles of Ceylon were all written or compiled by the Elders whose primary interest naturally lay in the history of Buddhism and Buddhist foundations. Although the religious motive finding its expression in the edification of all things connected with Buddhism, predominates over everything else, there is really an interplay throughout of two distinct motives, devotional and patriotic. The first of them may be construed as puritanic and sectarian, and the second as national and racial. Just as the religious motive cannot be divorced from the cultural advancement, so the patriotic motive cannot be separated from the promotion of the general cause of piety. The belief in miracle and supernaturalism has had its due rôle. Proper allowance must have to be made also for the inventive power of imagination behind some of the legends that have found their place in sober historical narratives. But, in spite of all these, it is now admitted on all hands that the chronicles of Ceylon are not full of mendacious fictions, their kernel and main bulk being history, nothing but history. The modern idea of sober and authentic history may be absent, but their permanent value as an indispensable source-book of history remains unchallenged. In fact in the absence of inscriptions, archaeological finds and foreign accounts, the chronicles only deal with the early history of Ceylon. The later history of Ceylon from Kittisiri-Meghavanna stands on a solid basis of fact as presented in the Cūlavamsa, and does not, therefore, need much comment. The historical position of the chronicles needs clarification in so far as they are concerned with the early history of the island and it may be worth while to examine it, period by period.

1. Pre-historic period.—The chronicles speak of a pre-historic period during which the island of Ceylon had undergone changes in its names before it came to be known by the name of Lankādīpa or Tambapaṇṇidīpa. These periods are conceived in terms of the successive dispensations of the four Buddhas, Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana, Kassapa, and Gotama, the advent of all of whom took place in the present era or æon of cosmic evolution, the development of the earth as the abode of men. The island which was known by the name of Ojadīpa in Kakusandha's time became known by the name of Varadīpa during the next dispensation. It was called Mandadīpa in the time of Kassapa, and Lankādīpa and Tambapannidīpa in Gotama's time.

The island had different capitals in succession. Abhaya-pura, Vaddhamana, Visāla, and Anuradhapura. Four different mountains came into prominence. Devakūta, Sumana-kūta, Subhakūta, and Cetiya-pabbata. Evidently the Buddhist chroniclers built up these legends on the basis of the Indian legends of the Buddhas in such canonical texts as the Mahāpadāna Suttanta and the Buddharamsa. However pious may be their motive, these cannot but appear to modern students as incredible and unhistorical. They will certainly be reluctant to go so far as to believe in miracles and supernatural powers upon which depends the credibility of visits and preachings by which the four great Buddhas of the present era sanctified the island in the prehistoric period of its history and culture. The chronicles are far from giving us a realistic account of the remains of the handicrafts of men who lived in the Palæolithic and Neolithic Ages. But they introduce us surely to two powerful aboriginal races of Yakkhas and Nāgas who hold sway over the island previous to the establishment of the Aryan rule. They are unaware of the Veddās who are taken to be present descendants of the Palæolithic dwellers. They have nothing to say about the Śībaras whose name lingers in the name of the village called Habaragāma. They make mention, on the other hand, of the Pulindas as a mixed race of aborigines who sprang from the union of an Indian prince with a Yakkhini. The Yakkhas, and Nāgas, too, appear at first sight as semi-mythical and semi-human savages who deserved to be tamed, defeated and destroyed. That there previously existed an island known by a certain name with its noted mountain peaks and hills is undeniable. But as regards its primitive inhabitants, the chronicles speak very lightly of them, and the accounts they give of them are at variance in some important respects with those met with elsewhere.¹

The invention of pious legends regarding the inestimable favour done to the country and its inhabitants by the Buddha through his miraculous visits and acts of grace was not peculiar to the chronicles of Ceylon. There were similar legends invented and cherished in other countries where Buddhism became the living faith of the people. But the Ceylon chroniclers far excelled others in this art.

¹ La'tour's Jōzō, No. 194, Jōzō II, pp. 127-130; its Sanskrit version in the Dhyōtōkō II, 523rd. Beal, Buddhist Records of the Western World I, p. lxxxi; Beal op cit., II, pp. 23rd. McCrindle, Ancient India II, 673, 1st 2nd.

The taming of the Yakkhas and Nāgas by the historical Buddha was in no way new. The Sutta and Vinaya Piṭakas record many instances thereof. The novelty lay only in the skilful adaptation of the canonical examples to different local conditions with all the ingenuity and the air of plausibility and truth. The lead given in the Dīpavaṃsa was faithfully followed in the later chronicles without any questioning about its reasonableness or soundness. It is interesting nevertheless to consider the historical information which can be gathered from the legendary accounts.

A. It is claimed that the plains of Laṅkā or Tambapaṇṇi were inhabited by men in the old ages, even when it was known as Ojadīpa, Varadīpa or Maṇḍadīpa. At the time of the rise of Buddhism the land was covered with great forests and full of horrors. It came then to be inhabited by the Yakkhas and such savage kinsmen as the Rākkhasas and Pisācas who were of various shapes and hideous forms, full of fury and wrath, wicked backbiters, pitiless and cruel, violent and merciless, and harmful. Thus the island stood badly in need of being secured against them, so that it might again be the peaceful, delightful, and congenial habitat of a large number of men.

B. The first wise and effective step to be taken was to follow the doctrine of segregation, the island of Laṅkā being reserved for the higher races of men and Giridīpa allotted to the predatory savages. The second island stood in close proximity to the first, and in their physical features they were almost alike; the latter was in some respects even superior to the former. Here the description of the two islands seems to be vivid and accurate. They had high and low lands, beautifully adorned with rivers, mountains and lakes, free from danger, well protected, surrounded by the ocean, rich in food-grains and blessed with a well-tempered climate. They were charming and delightful, green and cool, adorned with gardens and forests, fruit and flower trees, provided with ample living spaces, and subject to no master.

C. Geiger identifies Giridīpa with the highlands in the interior of Ceylon on the twofold ground: (1) that the word dīpa was formerly used in a wider sense, and (2) that the Yakkhas (evidently meaning the Veddās) are still to be found in Ceylon in later times.¹ This is not at all convincing, since the highlands in the interior of Ceylon are not separated from the mainland, and are not surrounded by the ocean.

¹ Mahāvamsa, Geiger's translation, p. 4.

D. In the next stage we find that within a few years the island of Lankā became a scene of conflict between the Nāgas who are distinguished as those who were dwellers of the sea, the dwellers of the mountains, and those of a riverine region at the mouth of the river Kalyāṇī. They are represented as matrimonially connected, while their kings are called Mahodara (big-bellied), Cūlodara (small bellied), and Maṇi-akkhika (gem-eyed). The name of Nāgadīpa apparently forming a part of Ceylon was derived from the Nāga settlers. The chroniclers were probably guilty of a confusion made between Nāga meaning serpents and Nāga standing for nagga (naked ones).

E. In the third stage at about the time of the Buddha's demise the chronicles go to depict a scene in which Ceylon is divided into two Yakkha principalities, the western one with Sirīsavatthu as its main city and the eastern one having Lankā for its capital. Strangely enough, Sirīsavatthu, which is mentioned in the Pali Valūhassa Jātaka, as the prosperous port and main city of Tambapaṇṇi division of Ceylon, is described here as the capital of the western Yakkha principality, situated below Tambapaṇṇidīpa.

F. In these connections the chronicles draw our attention to the sanctified site of the Subhāṅgana Thūpa on the bank of a river near Mahiya Pokkhala, to Guḍīpa (modern Karadive), the riverine region of Kalyāṇī (Kaelani), the principal river of Ceylon which flows down into the sea to the north of Colombo, the sites of the Kalyāṇī-cetiya, the Dīghavāpi-cetiya, Meghavanārāma, Mahābeddhi-cetiya, Mahā-thūpa, Thūpārāma-cetiya, Mahiyaṅgana-thūpa, and Mahānāga garden on the bank of the river called Gaṅgā or Mahāgaṅgā (modern Mahāwaeligaṅgā).

As a fitting introduction to the historical drama of Buddhism in Ceylon it is not enough to impress the reader with the high antiquity and sanctity of the island forming the scene of action. The Mahārājavaṃsa or great line of illustrious rulers in whose family Gotama the Buddha, the main actor and hero, was born, is indispensable as a means of heightening its antiquity and importance. Gotama's descent is traced from Mahāsammata, the first elected ruler and leader of men through three stages: from Mahāsammata to Accimā, from Accimā to Nemiya, and from Nemiya to Suddhodana, father of Siddhārtha-Gotama—a theological device followed in the Gospels of Jesus Christ.¹ The family-

¹ St. Matthew, 1, 17: 'So all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away into Babylon are line may be briefly traced from king Okkāka (Ikṣvāku), the pride being taken in having Gotama as a scion of the Solar race of Khatṭiyas. The illustrious predecessors of Jesus of Nazareth were all great patriarchs and prophets born in the Hebrew race, and their noble traditions are embodied in the Old Testament. As regards the illustrious predecessors of Gotama of Kapilavatthu, many of them are passing shadows, mere names, and the traditions of a few only are still preserved in the Jātakas and other Indian works. The chroniclers of Ceylon were not bound to vouchsafe for the authenticity of the long string of ornamental names.¹

2. Beginning of historical period.—The sequence of events which is the essence of historical narratives needs a framework of chronology. This is sought to be built in the chronicles of Ceylon on a twofold succession, the succession of rulers and ruling dynasties (rāja-paramparā) and the succession of the leading Elders (thera-paramparā).² The comparative continuity of the first being greater, the chronicles naturally rely more upon it. The chronology must begin from a certain definite date, which, in the case of the Ceylon chronicles, is the year of the Buddha's demise, making the starting point of the Buddha Era (Buddhavassa).

A happy coincidence is imagined and availed of to build up a systematic chronology of the kings of Ceylon, the coincidence of the day of the Buddha's demise with that of the landing of the exiled prince Vijaya on the island of Lankā.³ A prediction is put into the mouth of the Buddha to raise the importance of his appearance on the island as the founder of the first Aryan rule. An account is given of the circumstances that led to the banishment of the prince which proved to be a blessing in disguise for the future history of the island as a whole.

The chroniclers who were mad with the idea of the Indo-Aryan rule did not foresee the difficulties to be met by the modern historian. The abruptness of the establishment of an Indian form of monarchy goes against other historical traditions that sensibly represent it as the final result of an earlier and long process of settlement and colonization. They are silent altogether on the previous trade-connection of the island with the mainland of India. They are unaware of the tradition narrating how a leader of sea-going Indian merchants fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations.'

¹ Dīpavaṃsa, III; Mahāvāṃsa, II; Geiger's translation, pp. 10ff.

² Rhys Davids, Buddhist Suttas (S.B.E., Vol. XI), Intro., pp. xlvī ff.

³ Dīpavaṃsa, IX, 21; Mahāvāṃsa, VII, 1-3.

figured ultimately as the first monarch of Ceylon and the founder of the first ruling dynasty. Neither the process of colonization nor that of linguistic development could have taken place so soon. They would have us believe that the conqueror of the island then under the sway of the Yakkhas, and the founder of the first monarchy favourable to the propagation of Buddhism, was the banished crown prince Vijaya, the son of king Sihabāhu of the country of Lāla, with Sihapura as its capital, and the grandson of the king of Vaṅga on his maternal side. The location suggested leaves no room for doubt that the chroniclers kept in view Rāḍha (Ardhamāgadhi Lāḍha) meaning West Bengal and Sihapura on the northern border of the country of Kalinga. The legend¹ recorded by Hsien Tsang mentions South India as the scene of action of the lion and the princess. Presumably behind this legend was the history of Sihapura on the southern portion of Kalinga. The fondness of the people of Ceylon for the first-named Sihapura as the homeland of Vijaya is clear from the fact that even in later times two Indian princes, Nissankamalla and Sāhasamalla, from the royal house of this place, were successively offered the throne of Ceylon.² But if Sihapura, the homeland of Vijaya, were situated in western Bengal or southern India, there is no reason why the ship which carried Vijaya and his councillors and officers touched the western coast of India at the ports of Bharukaccha (Broach) and Suppāraka (Sopara) and proceeded therefrom to reach the western shore of Ceylon. It is equally unintelligible why another ship was carrying Vijaya's wife and her female companions to Mahilādīpa, which was undoubtedly an island governed by women and situated, according to Megasthenes³ and Hsien Tsang,⁴ below Persia and near the mouth of the Indus. The identification of Lāla by Geiger with Lāṭa on the western coast of India above Gujarat does not wholly meet the situation. The oldest form of the Sinhalese language, as found in the early Brāhmī inscriptions, appears as an Indo-Aryan dialect, which is very closely allied to the language of the Maṃsela version of Asoka's Rock Edicts. In accounting for all these facts the historian cannot but think of Sihapura in the lower eastern Punjab.

The change of the genitive suffix aya (Pali aya) into ha is a distinctive characteristic of old Sinhalese, which is without

¹ Watters, On Yuan Chwang, II, p. 233.

² Cūḷavamsa, P.T.S., Chap. 50, vv. 18 foll.

³ McCrindle, Ancient India, p. 150.

⁴ Watters, On Yuan Chwang, II, p. 237.

its parallel in any of the earlier known inscriptions of India. This goes to connect the language with Old Persian in which we have hyā for syā and the Dardic speech of Dardistan.¹ It is near about Dardistan that there still dwell a people called Singhans, i.e. Siṃhalas (Pali Sihaḷas).

The chronicles of Ceylon have nothing to say about the Uttarāpatha background of the ancient history of Ceylon. They will offer us cheap and fantastic explanations for the origin of the two names of the island, Sihaḷa because of the epithet Sihaḷa earned by Vijaya's father Sihabāhu since he had slain the lion,² and Tambapaṇṇi because of the fact that on their first landing on the island the hands of Vijaya's companions were coloured red with the dust of the red earth. While playing on the word tambapāṇi, 'red hand', they betray their ignorance of the fact that Tambapaṇṇi was just a Pali equivalent of the Sanskrit name Tāmrapaṇṇi or Tāmravarṇi, meaning the copper-coloured or red-coloured.

The matrimonial alliances between the royal house and nobles of Ceylon and those of the neighbouring country of Pāṇḍya are not unexpected. The island may have needed the services of the traditional eighteen guilds from Pāṇḍya for her town-planning and industrial development. The building of the towns of Tambapaṇṇi and Anurādhapura with its suburbs by Vijaya and the princes and counsellors who accompanied him is apparently too realistic to be disbelieved, although the fact may be that the work was not accomplished all at once. •

After setting up Vijaya as the king eponymous of Ceylon the chroniclers seem interested in building up a rāja-paramparā parallel to that of Magadha: from Vijaya to Devānampiya Tissa, from Ajātasattu to Dhammāsoka. Thereafter the thread of synechronism is lost, and it can be rarely established in individual cases on the joint evidence of the chronicles of Ceylon and other independent records.

The year of the Buddha's demise as known nowadays in Ceylon, Siam and Burma is 543 B.C. But the Buddha Era of 483 B.C. was current in Ceylon up till the fifteenth century, at the close of which a reform of the calendar was made. 483 B.C. agrees very nearly with 486 B.C., which is fixed on the strength of the Chinese dotted record maintained at Canton till the end of the year A.D. 489 and 487 B.C., which may be fixed on the strength of the contemporaneity of Devānampiya Asoka with the five Greek kings.³ In accordance with the Buddha Era of 483 B.C. Geiger presents the chronicle tables of the kings of Ceylon and Magadha as below:

¹ Barua, Ceylon Lectures, p. 45, f.n. 4.

² Mahāvamsa, Chap. 7, v. 42.

³ J.R.A.S., 1905, p. 51; ibid., 1906, pp. 984ff.; Ep. Zeyl., III, pp. 4ff.; J.R.A.S., Ceylon Branch, XXIII, No. 67, pp. 141ff.; Barua, Asoka and His Inscriptions, I, pp. 6ff.

B.C.			B.C.
1. Vijaya ..	483-445	{	1. Ajātasattu ..	491-459
Interregnum ..	445-444		2. Udayabhadda ..	459-443
2. Pandu Vāsudeva ..	444-414	{	3. Anuruddha and Munḍa	443-435
3. Abhaya ..	414-394		4. Nāgadāsaka ..	435-411
Interregnum ..	394-377	{	5. Susunāga ..	411-393
4. Panduka Abhaya ..	377-367		6. Kālāsoka ..	393-365
5. Muṭasaiva ..	367-247	{	7. Ten sons of Kālāsoka	365-343
6. Devānampiya Tissa	247-207		8. Nine Nanda brothers	343-321
		{	9. Candagutta ..	321-297
			10. Bindusāra ..	297-269
		{	11. Dharmāsoka ..	269-232

The immediate successor of king Vijaya is said to have been Paṇḍuvāsa¹ or Paṇḍuvāsudeva² who was the youngest brother of Vijaya and reigned for thirty years. The change of the Dīpavaṃsa name Paṇḍuvāsa into Paṇḍuvāsudeva must have been purposely done in the later chronicle Mahāvamsa, the author of which seems to have been somehow acquainted with the name of Paṇḍravāsudeva, king of Vāṅga and Kalinga, mentioned in the Mahābhārata in connection with the military campaign of Bhīma.³ But the earlier name Paṇḍuvāsa meaning the pale-robed one would seem more appropriate in view of the account given in the Mahāvamsa of his arrival in Ceylon with a retinue of thirty-two followers, all in the guise of Indian wandering ascetics (paribbājakaḷiṅgarū). The later chronicle supersedes the earlier one in mentioning the mouth of the river Mahākandara⁴ as the landing place of Paṇḍuvāsudeva and his retinue.⁵ From this place they are said to walk down to Upatissagāma, a locality in a suburb of Anurādhapura.

Another happy coincidence is devised for a critical juncture when a suitable princess was needed to be the queen of Paṇḍuvāsa. The princess supplied is a Śākya maiden called Kaccānū or Bhaddakaccānū who arrived on the island precisely with a retinue of thirty-two maidens. The story of matrimonial alliance of the royal house with a Śākya royal house of a kingdom founded on the southern bank of the Ganges, was thought to be an attractive prelude to a course of events leading to the establishment of the Buddhist faith in the island. The foundation of a new Śākya territory on the southern bank of the Ganges needed a plausible explanation.

¹ Dīpavaṃsa, X, 2.

² Mahāvamsa, VIII, 10.

³ Mbh., Sabhā P., Chap. 34, v. 11 (Vaṅga & Eka).

⁴ Mahāvamsa, VIII, 12. According to Geiger, it was probably a small stream to the north of Mannar.

⁵ Rel., VIII, 12.

and it was found in the historical tradition of the massacre of the Śākyaas by Viḍūḍabha the usurper king of Kośala in the last year of the Buddha's life.¹ The same is utilized by the chroniclers of other places for explaining the foundation of Śākya territories elsewhere.² I have shown elsewhere that the story of the decimation of the Śākyaas in the Buddha's lifetime is falsified by the Pali canonical representation of the Śākyaas of Kapilavatthu as one of the powerful claimants for the bodily remains of the Buddha.³

The earlier chronicle has nothing more to say than this that the Śākya princess Kaecānā who came to the island from Jambudīpa (India) became the chief queen of Paṇḍuvāsa. The relationship of Paṇḍuvāsa with Vijaya is not mentioned, nor is it said that he came across from India. The Dīpavaṃsa is silent about the territory from which Kaecānā came and the circumstances under which she had to leave her father's territory.⁴ The missing links are ingeniously supplied in the Mahāvamsa. We are told that the princess Bhaddakāecānā, too, came in a ship with her retinue, all in the guise of female wandering ascetics (paribbājikā)⁵ evidently to evade the risk of being attacked by pirates on the way. The fascination of the number thirty-three for the chronicler lay apparently in the theological motive to suggest that the island was converted into a heaven of the thirty-three gods and goddesses.

The chronicles did not stop there. They would bring into the island the seven Śākya princes, all grandsons of Amitodana, a brother of Suddhodana, to figure as seven gāmaṇīs or village headmen.⁶ The seven settlements of these princes, all brothers of Bhaddakāecānā, were respectively named after them as Rāmagāma, Tissagāma, Anurādhagāma, Mahāligāma, Dīghāvugāma, Rohiṇigāma.⁷ The Mahāvamsa omits the name of Tissa and spells the name of the seventh prince as Rohaṇa. It credits Anurādha also with the excavation of a tank to the south of Anurādhagāma.⁸

The parallelism between the two rāja-paramparās is brought out thus in the Dīpavaṃsa: In the ninth year of Ajātasattu's reign Vijaya came to Ceylon. In the sixteenth year of Udaya's reign Paṇḍuvāsa was crowned. In the

¹ Mahāvamsa, VIII, 18-19.

² Watters, On Yuan Chwang, I, p. 238.

³ B. C. Law, Some Kṣatriya Tribes of Ancient India, Chap. V.

⁴ Dīpavaṃsa, X, 1-2.

⁵ Mahāvamsa, VIII, 24: The landing place of the princess is said to have been Goṇagāma apparently at the mouth of the same river called Mahākandara.

⁶ Dīpavaṃsa, X, 6-7; Mahāvamsa, IX, 15.

⁷ Dīpavaṃsa, Chap. X.

⁸ Mahāvamsa, Chap. IX, vv. 9-11.

interval between the two kings, Vijaya and Paṇḍuvāsa, the island had no king for one year. In the twenty-first year of Nāgadāsa Paṇḍuvāsa died and Abhaya was crowned. In the fourteenth year of Candagutta king Pakuṇḍaka died and his son Muṭasiva was consecrated. In the eighteenth year of Asoka king Muṭasiva died to be succeeded by his son Devānampiya Tissa.¹ Pakuṇḍaka of the Dīparamsa is the same king as Paṇḍuka Abhaya of the Mahāvamsa, father of Muṭasiva and grandfather of Tissa. The identity of the two is suggested in the Dīparamsa itself.²

The royal line of Vijaya, better of Paṇḍuvāsa, became deflected when the rulership of the island was seized by Pakuṇḍaka or Paṇḍuka Abhaya after slaying seven of his maternal uncles, the younger brothers of king Abhaya, who died after a successful reign of twenty years. On his paternal side Paṇḍuka Abhaya is represented as the grandson of the Śākya prince who figured in the island as Dighāvu the clever Gāmaṇī.³ It is interesting to note how the chroniclers availed themselves of the Indian legend of Devagabbhā, Nandagopā, Vāsudeva and Kamsa as contained in the Ghata Jātaka.⁴

It is certain that Devānampiya Tissa who was definitely a Ceylon contemporary of Devānampiya Asoka was preceded by a line of kings, even if we prefer with Dr. Paranavitana to regard them as elected leaders and not as properly consecrated rulers. The royal line which commenced from the reign of Pakuṇḍaka or Paṇḍuka would seem quite historical. The earlier framework of the political history of Ceylon is more or less a got up thing. The true significance of the Dīparamsa name Paṇḍuvāsa is still a matter of speculation. I have taken it so far to mean the pale-robed one, but it may as well be a Pali or Prakrit equivalent of Pāṇḍyavarṣa meaning one from the Pāṇḍya country, i.e. a Pāṇḍya by his nationality. The name Paṇḍuka is apparently of the same import. According to Megasthenes the Pāṇḍyas were originally a people who maintained the tradition of a matriarchal form of society.⁵

Assuming that the political history of Ceylon began from the reign of Paṇḍuka, it is important to note how his career is described in the chronicles. He rose into power and eminence from the family of a village headman and popular leader.⁶ He started his career as a robber with the forest as his hiding

¹ Dīparamsa, XI, 8-14

² Ibid., X, 8.

³ McCrindle, Ancient India, p. 150.

⁴ Ibid., X, 9; XI, 1.

⁵ Jātaka, No. 454.

⁶ Cf. Mehergrām Copperplate Inscription of Nāmodaradeva which records an Indian instance of the rise of the Deva dynasty of Samatara from the family of a grāmaṇī.

place. The first definite step to seizing the rulership was to get rid of his rivals. After obtaining the rulership his first duty was to establish peace and order in the country. The chronicles credit him with an unusual length of reign for seventy years. His son and successor Muṭasiva, too, is said to have reigned for sixty years. The earlier chronicle skips over a very important matter relating to Paṇḍuka's reign, which is dealt with in the Mahāvamsa. It appears that in building up Anurādhapura into a fine and prosperous city, evidently on the site of Anurādhagāma, he faithfully followed the Indian system of town-planning and town administration.

The city was provided with four gates, each of which opened into a dvāragāma or suburb. Four tanks were caused to be made, one on each side, all named after Abhaya. The city was guarded by the Yakkha shrines on the four sides, that of the Yakkha Kāḷavela on the east side, that of the Yakkha Cīttarāja on the same side at the lower end of the Abhaya-tank, that of a Yakkhinī at the south gate, the Banyan shrine of the Yakkha Vessavana Kubera presumably at the north gate, and the Palmyra-palm shrine of Vyādhideva presumably at the west gate.¹ Within the precincts of the royal palace was built the central shrine of an Assamukhī yakkhinī. To all of these demi-gods and demi-goddesses the sacrificial offerings were caused to be made year by year, while on festival days the king sat beside the image of Cīttarāja on a seat of equal height and having the dolls of gods and goddesses and human dancers to dance before them. Similarly the charity-halls were put up on the four sides.²

The city was caused to be guarded by a city-warden (nagara-guttika). On its western side were quartered the caṇḍālas who did the work of sweepers, cleaners of sewers, corpse-bearers and watchers of the cemetery. The caṇḍālas had a separate cemetery for their use to the north-east of their locality. North of the caṇḍāla cemetery and between it and the Pāsāṇa mountain were built the huts for the huntsmen (vyādhas). In the space to the north of these and extending as far as the Gāmaṇī tank was built a hermitage for the hermits (tāpasas). To the east of the same caṇḍāla cemetery was built a house for the Nigaṇṭha (Jaina recluse) Jotiya, and in that locality dwelt the Nigaṇṭha called Giri and the recluses (samaṇas) of various orders. A temple

¹ Mahāvamsa (X, 89-90) wrongly places the shrines of Vessavana and Vyādhideva on the western side.

² Mahāvamsa (X, 90) places them only on the western side. Geiger and others have failed to make out the right word dānasambhāgavatthum; here yonasabhāgavatthum is meaningless.

(devakula) was caused to be built for the Nigantha Kumbhanda, which was named after him. Westward of these and eastward of the huts of huntsmen dwelt five hundred families of heretical faith. Beyond Jotiya's house and on this side of the Gāmaṇī tank were caused to be built a retreat for the wandering ascetics (paribbājakārāma), and an abode for the Ājīvikas, and a residence for the Brāhmaṇas.

Hore the city of Anurādhapura as built by Paṇḍuka Abhaya appears as a Ceylon counterpart of an Indian city like Rājagaha, Vesālī or Pāṭaliputta. Whether all the details given in the Mahāvamsa about it, when it was first built, be literally true or not, the religious conditions and atmosphere which prevailed in the island previous to the reign of Devānampiya Tissa and the propagation of Buddhism are precisely the same as those presupposed by the 13th Rock Edict of Asoka. The hermits, Brahman wandering ascetics, Ājīvikas, Jaina and other recluses were the precursors of the Buddhist missionaries and preachers as much as in India as in Ceylon. They were the pre-Asokan and pro-Tissa evangelists of the Indo-Aryan culture who prepared the ground for Buddhism.¹ The island had the age-old shrines of the Yakkhas, Rākṣhasas, Pisācas and Nāgas. Mahinda, the king of the gods, had been the guardian deity of Laṅkā before Mahinda, the propagator of Buddhism, took over the charge of the island. The ascetic god Śiva had a good deal of hold over the religious belief of the people, and it is manifest even from the personal names of Girikaṇḍasiva and king Muṭasiva, father of Tissa. The god Uppalavaṇṇa or Viṣṇu was the intermediary between the two Mahindas.

The contemporaneity of Tissa with Asoka, both honoured with the same epithet, is shown to have afforded an important junction for the meeting of the three lines of chronological succession, namely, the *rājaparamparā*s of Magadha and Ceylon and the theraparamparā of the orthodox Buddhist order. Thus the chronicles enjoy a triple importance through their bearings on the early political histories of India and Ceylon and the early history of Buddhism. As regards Ceylon, the political, social and religious background of this junction has already been discussed and characterized. The three main landmarks of the early history of Buddhism from the demise of the Buddha are the three orthodox councils (saṃgītis), each preceded by a general gathering of the monks (sannipāta), out of which the delegates were selected. In connection with the councils the three royal patrons are said to have gained in importance, namely, Ajātasattu, Kālāsoka and Dhammāsoka. While judging the success of a reign three main considerations rest on the chroniclers' decision: (i) the removal of the undesirable elements and the quelling of the disturbing factors with a view to making the island a fit habitat for the higher races of men, (2) the works of piety and public utility, and (3) the aids to the cause of religion and religious foundations and the development of art and architecture. From the Buddhist point of view too, the main grounds of consideration are: (1) the patronage to the orthodox order in the task of collecting the traditional teachings of the Buddha, handing them down by an oral tradition or preserving them by means of writing, and promoting the cause of Buddhist education and scholarship, (2) the aids to the same in maintaining its activity and integrity by getting the help of the heretics and schismatics, and (3) the stabilization of the position of Buddhism and enhancement of its popularity through the erection of magnificent monasteries (ārāmas, vihāras) and Buddhist shrines, particularly the thūpas or dagobas, the latter as tangible means of keeping up the memory of the Buddha and other great personages among his disciples and followers. Judged by all the six considerations Devānampiya Asoka of India was sure to be found the best monarch on the earth who appeared to the chroniclers as a living embodiment of the cakkavattī ideal of the Buddha. It was then natural to them to idolize as much Dhammāsoka of Jambudīpa as their own Devānampiya Tissa.

¹ Law, India as described in early texts of Buddhism and Jainism, pp. 214.
McCandless, Ancient India, pp. 69, 100, 120

To honour Devānampiya Tissa as the first great builder the Mahāvamsa preserves the following traditional list of memorable erections: the Mahāvihāra and Cetiyavihāra, the Thūpārāma and Mahāthūpa, the shrine of Mahābodhi, a stone-pillar before the Mahācetiya or Mahāthūpa bearing an inscription, the Collar-bone shrine at Mahiyaṅgaṇa, the Issarasamanaka Vihāra on the spot where Mahinda converted five hundred votaries of Issara meaning Śiva, the Tissa Tank, the Paṭhama Thūpa at the landing place of Mahinda, the Vessagiri Vihāra at the place where Mahinda converted five hundred men of the Vessa caste, the delightful Upāsikāvihāra, Hatthālhaka Vihāra and two nunneries, the Jambukola Vihāra at the port of Jambukola in Nāgadīpa, and the Tissa Mahāvihāra and Pācīnavihāra at Anurādhapura.¹

The rājaparāmparā of Magadha as presented in the chronicles shows the succession of four ruling dynasties: the dynasty traced from Bhātiya, father of Bimbisāra, and a friend and contemporary of Suddhodana, father of Gotama the Buddha, the Susunāga (Saisunāga), the Nanda, the Moriya (Maurya). They were unaware of the fact that the rulers of the first dynasty were known as Haryāṅkas.¹ The Purāṇas treat the first two dynasties as one and apply to it the name of Śisunāga or Śaisunāga. The chronicles are not concerned with the Brhadrathas who were the precursors of the Haryāṅkas. It is on the whole found that the chronological succession of the rulers of Magadha from Bhātiya as suggested in the chronicles is the most reliable of all. The Buddhist Sarvāstivāda tradition is defective for a two-fold reason: (1) that it ignores the history of a century, and (2) that it is guilty of a confusion between Kālāsoka the Susunāga and Dhammāsoka the Moriya. The importance of Ajātasattu is stressed on two grounds: (1) the collection of the bodily remains of the Buddha from all the thūpas in which they were at first enshrined for depositing them in one thūpa built at Rājagaha, and (2) the facilities offered to the five hundred leading Theras when they met at the First Council for the collection of the words of the Buddha and the preparation of the first redaction of the Theravāda or Pali Canon.

¹ Mahāvamsa, XX, 17-25.

With regard to the first wise deed of Ajātasattu for facilitating the great work to be done by Dhammāsoka the chronicles sought to establish an island parallel in a similar deed on the part of Devānampiya Tissa with reference to the great work to be done by Duṭṭhagāmaṇi Abhaya who was the national hero of Ceylon in the estimation of Mahānāma, the famous author of the Mahāvamsa. Unexpectedly the account given of the Rājagaha Thūpa of Ajātasattu with all the details of its construction² is highly exaggerated. This account presupposes not only a Buddhist stūpa in India, such as that of Bhūrhut completed as late as 100 B.C., but also even those built in Ceylon in the time of Duṭṭhagāmaṇi.

As regards the part played by Ajātasattu in connection with the First Buddhist Council, the Pali Canonical account in the Vinaya Cullavagga, Chap. XI, is completely silent. The chronicles while giving an account of the First Council overstep certain limits set in the earlier and more authentic Vinaya description. The latter, for instance, does not associate the place of the Council with the Sattapanni Cave, nor does it tell us that the three Piṭakas were brought into existence by the Theras under the leadership of Mahākassapa.

¹ B. C. Law, Asoka, p. 80.

² Sumangalavamsa, II, pp. 611ff.; Tāgarama, pp. 34-35.

The description goes only so far as to state that the nucleus of the Buddhist canon was formed by the five Nikāyas and two Vinaya books, namely, the Bhikkhu-vibhaṅga and the Bhikkhunī-vibhaṅga.¹

It is true that the Vinaya account of the Second Buddhist Council, too, clearly points to 100 B.C. as an important chronological landmark of the early history of Buddhism, and the fact is corroborated by the internal evidence of a few other Canonical texts.² It may be true that 100 B.E. fell within the reign of Kālāsoka, identified by Dr. Raychaudhuri with Kāka-varṇa of the Purāṇas. But the Vinaya description is reticent on the part played by Kālāsoka in the matter of the Council itself. There is another important point of difference to which the reader's attention must be drawn.

All that the Vinaya account offers us is a description of the general conference of the Theras which appointed a judicial committee of eight representatives to give its considered findings on the ten issues arising from the indulgences of the Vajjiputtaka monks of Vesālī in contravention of Vinaya rules.

It has nothing to say regarding the Second Council convened to recite and canonize the authoritative Buddhist texts and the Great Council (Mahāsaṅgīti) convened by the Vajjiputtaka monks for vindicating their position as against the arbitrary action of the orthodox Theras. It is reticent also on the rise of the eighteen Buddhist sects and schools of thought previous to the reign of Asoka as a sequel to the first rupture brought about in the Saṅgha by the Vajjiputtaka seceders.

These three deficiencies are made good in the chronicles. That the Vinaya description is incomplete without the account of the Second Council proper may be taken for granted, otherwise the incorporation of some texts and compilations into the growing corpus of the Buddhist Canon, even such texts as the Vinaya Mahāvagga and Cullavagga, the Serissakavatthu and several discourses with reference to Pāṭaliputta, is inexplicable. It seems very likely that the high-handed action on the part of the orthodox section of the Buddhist brotherhood of the age was bound to be followed by a schismatic reaction. This eventuality is equally borne out by the Sarvāstivāda tradition as embodied in the writings of Vasumitra, Bhavya and Vinitadeva. The Chinese pilgrim

¹ Vinaya Pitaka, edited by Oldenberg, II, p. 287.

² The Serissaka story forming the canon basis of the Vimāna and Peta-vatthus professes to be a composition of 100 B.E. B. C. Law, History of Pali Literature, Vol. I, p. 36.

Hiuen Tsang, too, was well aware of the tradition about the eighteen sects. Unfortunately even Vasumitra, the earliest among the Sarvāstivāda writers, cannot be supposed to have flourished in an age anterior to the reign of the Kuṣāṇa king Kanishka. The reliability of the Ceylon tradition about the rise of the eighteen sects prior to Asoka's time is doubted for the first time by Dr. D. R. Bhandarkar on the strength of the evidence of the three versions of Asoka's Schism Pillar Edicts at Sārnāth, Kauśāmbī and Sāñcī¹ and subsequently discussed at length by Dr. Barua,² and in the opinion of both the history of the rise of these earlier Buddhist sects must have to be relegated to a post-Asokan period. The utmost concession which could be made to the Ceylon tradition is that the unorthodox views discussed in the Kathāvatthu which is traditionally a compilation of the eighteenth year of Asoka's reign, were the views of individual members and their adherents within one and the same Saṅgha and not those of separate sects and schools of thought whose names figure prominently in Indian inscriptions, none of which can be dated earlier than the first century B.C. and later than the third century after Christ. Buddhaghosa, the author of the Kathāvatthu Commentary, clearly distinguishes between the views as upheld by the individual teachers and their supporters in Asoka's time, and the same as upheld in his days by the different Buddhist sects and schools. The author of the Nikāya-saṅgraha suggests an ingenious way out of the difficulty by stating that the 'Tīrthakas who had been expelled from the Saṅgha in Asoka's time on account of their non-conformity with the rules of the Canon grow angry and assembled at Nālandā. They deliberated together with a view to causing a breach among the Śākya monks. Determined to become monks again, they returned, and failing to gain admission into the Theriya order, they went to the fraternities of the seventeen schismatic sects, the Mahāsaṅghika and the rest. Even these orders they left afterwards, and after two hundred and thirty-five years from the Buddha's demise they separated into six divisions and resided in six places giving rise to nine later sects: Homavata, Rājagiri, Siddhārtha, Pūrvaśailī, Aparāśailī, Vājirī, Vaitulya, Andhaka and Anya-mahā-saṅghika.³

Thus the author of a Sinhalese chronicle of the fourteenth century tried to reconcile the earlier available Ceylon traditions regarding the rise of the Buddhist schismatics as several sects both before and after Asoka. They are apparently guilty of an anachronism. The Schism Pillar Edict of Asoka promulgates an ordinance, meaning to penalize those who will cause a division in the Saṅgha (ye bhāḅhati, future tense), while the Ceylon traditions tell us that Asoka actually penalized the schismatics. Here is a glaring instance of confusion between the future on the one hand and present and past on the other.

¹ Asoka, revised Ed., p. 100.

² Barua, Asoka and His Inscriptions, Pt. I, pp. 332ff.

³ Nikāya-saṅgraha, p. 9.

The Dīpavaṃsa says nothing about the Nandas. Incidentally it refers to the reign of Candagutta of the Moriya family (Moriya-kula).¹ The gap between the Susunāgas and the Moriyas is filled up by the *Mahāvamsa*² with the reign of the Nine Nandas. In the latter work Candagutta is said to have killed Dhanananda, the last Nanda king, and secured the sovereignty over the whole of Jambudīpa under the guidance of the wrathful Brāhman Cāṇakka (Cāṇakya). The Mahāvamsa-Tīkā goes still further to avail itself of a fantastic story to account for the name of Candagutta and of other legends to connect Candagutta and his descendants with the Moriyas, undoubtedly the Moriyas of Pippalivana, and ultimately with the Śākyas of Kapilavatthu. It narrates the early life and training of Candagutta under Cāṇakka.³ Evidently there grew up in later times a Ceylon Buddhist version of the legend of Candagutta and Cāṇakka as a counterpart of the Brahmanical and Jaina versions.

With the chroniclers of Ceylon Bindusāra, the son and successor of Candagutta, is just a passing shadow. They are unaware of the legend of Bindusāra in the Mañjuśrī Mūlakaḅpa.

The historical value of the Pali legendary materials for the life and career of Asoka has been carefully discussed and assessed by competent scholars.⁴ But it may not be out of place to state below some of the main results hitherto obtained. It is opined that these legends are not altogether fictitious. They are of great value only in so far as they supplement the information which can be gathered from the inscriptions and Greek writings. They are certainly one-sided and inconclusive. There was distinctly a Buddhist theological motive behind the connection which is sought to be established between the Moriyas of Magadha with the Moriya clan of warriors and ultimately with the Śākyas. In many respects

¹ Dīpavaṃsa, VI, 19.

² Mahāvamsa, V, 66.

³ Vamsatthappakāsinī, I, pp. 183ff.

⁴ Rhys Davids, Buddhist India, pp. 274ff.; Radhakumud Mookerji, Asoka, p. 2; Barua, Asoka and His Inscriptions, Pt. I, pp. 7ff.

the legends are irreconcilable with Asoka's own records. On the whole the tradition preserved in the Dipavamsa is most helpful to the modern historian, particularly with regard to the double conversion and coronation of Asoka.

The main concern of the Ceylon chroniclers about Asoka is to represent him as the greatest known Buddhist emperor of Jambudīpa, as the greatest builder of Buddhist vihāras and religious monuments, and as the greatest supporter of the Buddhist faith and missionary activities. The vital point in which the inscriptions are apt to disappoint them is the lack of corroboration of the truth in the legend claiming Mahinda and Saṅghamittā to be beloved children of Asoka by his Vaiśya wife Devī of Vidisā. Until the thirteenth or fourteenth year of Asoka his children were completely out of the picture (R.E. V). None can think of Asoka having grown up sons before his 27th regnal year (P.E. VII). Some amount of suspicion is sure to arise in connection with the chronicle story of Mahinda's coming to the island through the air, and this is enhanced by the more probable story narrated by Hiuen Tsang that Mahinda's missionary work had been directed to the country of Malayakūṭa which is no other than Tāmraparṇī of the Great Epio, situated in the extreme south of the Deccan, below Pāṇḍya or Drāviḍa and Tambapanni of Asokan edicts (R.E. II and XIII). It is from the country of Malayakūṭa that Mahinda went across to Ceylon, the island of Tambapanni.

The Pālī traditional account of the rise of the eighteen Buddhist sects or schools of thought during the century which elapsed between the reigns of Kūlāsoka and Asoka and that of the heterodox views upheld by others, the Brāhmanas, the Paṇḍarāṅga Parivrājakas, Ājīvikas, and Nirgranthas, who, led by the greed of gain, assumed the garb of monks and stealthily entered the Asokārāma at Pāṭaliputta, are irreconcilable. It is said that on account of the heresies advocated by them the orthodox monks declined to hold the uposatha or perform other ecclesiastical functions with them for a period of nine years. Asoka deputed a high official to request them to resume the uposatha and other duties, and when they declined to do so, he misunderstanding the intention of the king's order, beheaded some of them, an action deeply regretted by the king. To make amends for the blunder committed by his officer, Asoka caused a conference of the monks to be held at Pāṭaliputta for examining the inmates of the local monastery who were maintaining those views. They were examined by the leading Thera called Moggallaputta Tissa, group by group, and batch by batch, in the king's presence, and those whose views did not tally with the Vibhajjavāda, known as the genuine doctrine of the Buddha, were disrobed and expelled. Thus the undesirable elements were got rid of. Thereafter the Theras who were the true followers of the Buddha could be persuaded to resume and carry on the uposatha and other ecclesiastical duties as usual. They convened a council, the third orthodox Buddhist Council at Pāṭaliputta under the presidency of Moggaliputta Tissa. The compilation and canonization of the Kathāvatthu, embodying accounts of the controversies which took place at the preceding conference and their results, formed the outstanding work of this Council, besides the usual rehearsal of the texts of the Buddhavacana as then known to the Buddhist community. The Council was followed by the despatch of Buddhist missions to different countries, situated mostly, if not all, within India. The missions were despatched on the initiative of Moggaliputta Tissa.

In the Kathāvatthu itself the points at issue are not referred to any person or sect. Each of them is discussed on its merit. Buddhaghosa, too, does not suggest that the points discussed arose from the views of any or all of the pre-Asokan eighteen sects. The sects which existed in his time are brought in only as distinct schools of thought who maintained the views that were advocated in Asoka's time by the outsiders who entered the Asokārāma in the garb of Buddhist monks. The eighteen sects and their later offshoots came to figure prominently in the Indian inscriptions which cannot be dated earlier than the first century B.C. and later than the beginning of the fourth century A.D. The author of the Nikāyasaṅgraha saw the difficulty and as a way out of it he came to suggest that the outsiders gained admission into the seventeen unorthodox sects after they had failed to enter the Orthodox order of the Theras. This does not solve the problem regarding the rise of the eighteen sects in pre-Asokan times. The chronology suggested in the Pali tradition of Ceylon is not identical with that offered by Vasumitra in his account of the sects.¹ The light which may be obtained from the Schism Pillar Edict of Asoka is that there arose in his time certain causes threatening the unity and integrity of the Saṅgha, but these were not of a formidable nature. The king was in a position to state that those causes could be easily removed and the Saṅgha could be rendered 'whole and entire' for all times to come.

¹ Journal of the Department of Letters, Calcutta University, Vol. I, Masuda, Early Indian Buddhist Schools.

The tradition concerning the despatch of Buddhist missions to different places in India and to two places outside India deserves more than a passing notice. Unfortunately a similar tradition is not traced in the works of other sects. Hiuen Tsang knew certainly of a tradition that the Thera Mahinda, a brother of Asoka, did his missionary work in the country of Malayakūta below Drāvida before he went across to the island of Simhala. Although the missionaries were sent on the authority of Moggaliputta Tissa, it is found that the places within India to which they are said to have gone are places where Asoka set up his edicts and inscriptions.

- | | | |
|---|------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|
| 1 | Kasmīra Gandhāra | Asoka's Rock Edicts at Man sohra |
| 2 | Yona | Rock Edicts at Shahbazgarhi in the district of Peshawar |
| 3 | Mahisamandala | Rock and Minor Rock Edicts at Yerragudi in the Karnool district |
| 4 | Maharattha | Minor Rock Edict at Gavi
math and Pallagunda |
| 5 | Vanavasa | Minor Rock Edict at Isila |
| 6 | Aparanta | Rock Edicts at Sopāra |
| 7 | Himavanta | Rock Edicts at Kālsi in the district of Dehra Dun |

The two places or countries which lay according to the chronicles outside India are Suvannabhūmi and the island of Lankā or Tambapanni. It is shown that the country of Tambapanni which finds mention in Asoka's Rock Edicts II and XIII is not necessarily the island of Tambapanni. It is apparently the country of Tamraparni, modern Tinnevely district, placed by the Mahābhārata, south of Pāndya or Drāvida with Mt. Vaidūryaka as its rocky landmark, in that case it is no other than Hiuen Tsang's country of Malayakūta. There existed a land route, even till the time of Hiuen Tsang, connecting Aparānta and Kārnāta with the lower Kāveri Valley. It is therefore possible that a traveller starting from Vidisa and Ujjayini could reach the country of Tambapanni below Pāndya by following this land route along the banks of the Kāveri via Mahisamandala or Mysore. The journey further down to the island of Tambapanni was a matter of crossing the ferry.

As regards Suvannabhūmi, it is suggested that probably the original place name was Suvannagiri, which was the seat of southern viceroyalty in Asoka's time in view of the fact that the Dīpavaṃsa description differs materially from that in the Mahāvamsa.¹

The chronicles speak of two coronations of Devānampiya Tissa, the second taking place six months after the first, in honour of the presents from Asoka, his distinguished Indian friend and ally. According to Dr. Paranavitana the second coronation of Tissa was the proper form of royal coronation and the so-called coronations prior to that were simple ceremonies of electing popular leaders.

The Dīpavaṃsa alone speaks of two consecrations of Prince Piyadassana, the first under the title of Asoka, four years after his accession to the throne of Bindusāra, and the second under the title of Piyadassi, six years after the first.² Here the Dīpavaṃsa tradition representing 'Asoka' as a royal title assumed by Asoka must be preferred to the Divyāvadāna legend representing the same as a personal name given him by his father at the instance of his mother. The truth in the Dīpavaṃsa tradition is borne out by the evidence of the inscriptions of Asoka.³

The tradition of the fratricidal war through which Prince Piyadassana's way to his father's throne lay is not clearly supported by the evidence of Asoka's R.E. V. The Divyāvadāna speaks of the killing of one stepbrother, which is a more probable story, while the Ceylon chronicles tell us that Asoka killed all his ninety-nine half-brothers. The story of Tissarakkhā in the Mahāvamsa blackening the history of the closing period of Asoka's reign was derived evidently from a later Indian source and it reads in some respects like the story of Tisarakṣitā in the Divyāvadāna. The Divyāvadāna story of the Ājīvika guru of Asoka's mother, predicting her son's accession to the throne of Magadha, could not have its counterpart in any Pali work of Ceylon earlier than the Mahāvamsa-Tīkā. The Dīpavaṃsa agrees with the Divyāvadāna in giving

¹ Dīpav., VIII, 11:

Suvaṇṇabhūmiṃ gantvāna Soṇuttarā mahiddhikā |
niddhametvā piṣācagaṇe mocesi bandhanā bahu ||

Mahāv., XII, 44-45:

Saddhīm Uttaratherena Soṇatthero mahiddhiko |
Suvaṇṇabhūmiṃ agamā, tasmim tu samaye pana |
jāte jāte rājagehe dārake ruddarakkhasi |
samuddato nikkhamitvā bhakkhayitvāna gacchati ||

Cf. Samantapāsādikā, I, pp. 68ff., where both the descriptions are given without any comment. The earlier chronicle does not place the country on the sea-shore and associates it with the Piśācas.

² Dīpav., VI, 22-24.

³ Barua, Asoka and His Inscriptions, Pt. I, pp. 16ff.

the credit for the conversion of Asoka to the Buddhist faith to an Elder, whether the Thera Nigrodha or Sthavira Sumudra, and not to a novice of seven years of age, who is represented in the later chronicle as the posthumous son of Sumana, the elder stepbrother of Asoka. The interest of the Dipavamsa lies also in the fact that it settles once for all the interpretation of Asoka's statement—samghe upayite, which occurs in his Minor Rock Edict.

Though the mystery of the personal relationship of Mahinda and Sanghamittā with Asoka cannot be solved in the light of Asoka's own records, there is no valid reason as yet to dispute the fact of their going down to Ceylon for the propagation of Buddhism during the reign of king Devānampiya Tissa. The real foundation of the history of Buddhism in Ceylon may be taken to have been laid through the establishment of the order of monks by Mahinda and that of the order of nuns by Sanghamittā. The traditional succession of the Vinaya teachers is expressly traced from Mahinda in the Vinaya Parivārapāṭha compiled in Ceylon by a Thera named Dīpa, and the chronicle account of the Buddhist missions despatched to different countries is corroborated, partly at least, as shown by Geiger, by the relic casket inscriptions in the Stūpas of Sāñchi and Sonāri, one of which preserves for us also the name of Moggaliputta. The chronicle account of the planting of a Bo graft in the heart of Ceylon and that of the enshrinement of certain relics of the Buddha in some dagobas built in the time of Devānampiya Tissa may also be taken to be true.

As shown before the seventeenth chapter of the Dipavamsa commences a new chronicle with these words

*'Battimsa yojaaam dīgham atthārasahi utthalam ;
Yojanasata ātattam sāgarena parikkhītam ;
Lankādīpavaram nāma sabbattha ratanūkarava ;
Upetam naditalākehi pabbatthi caachi ca ;
dīpam purāṇa ca rājā ca upaddutaṇ ca dhātuyo ;
thūpara dīpaṇ ca pabbata nyyānam boḍhi bhikkhuni ;
bhikkhu ca buddhasattho ca terava honti te tahi ;
ekadesa caturoāmnam sunūtha mama bhāsato ;'*

'Thirty two leagues in length, eighteen leagues in breadth, hundred leagues in circumference, surrounded by the ocean is the excellent island called Lankā, which is everywhere a mine of treasure. It possesses rivers and tanks, hills and forests. The island, the capital, the king, the trouble, the riches, the stūpa, the lake, the mountain, the garden, the Bo tree, the bhikkhuni, the bhikkhu and the most exalted Buddha—these are the thirteen themes. Listen when I speak of them, each in four names (in relation to four Ages).'

The Dīpavaṃsa presents here only a bare outline of the political history of Ceylon from Muṭasiva to Mahāsenā. As for the religious history, the whole of Chap. XVII is devoted to the career of Mahinda which extended over two reigns, namely, that of Devānampiya Tissa and that of Uttiya, his brother and successor. The Theras of Ceylon were naturally interested in having before them a chronological succession of the leading Vinaya teachers from Mahinda onwards and a similar succession of the leading nuns from the time of Saṅghamittā. Though the first is missed in the chronicles themselves, it is preserved in the Vinaya Parivāra. The second is presented in Chap. XVIII of the earlier chronicle. Here the earlier chronicle credits Devānampiya Tissa with the erection of the Tissārāma, an excellent monastery named after him and the planting of a Bodhi graft at Mahāmeghavana.

For a systematic traditional history of Ceylon from Mahāsiva, the younger brother and successor of Uttiya, to Mahāsenā, we cannot but depend on the Mahāvamsa. The Tīkā has hardly anything new to add to the information supplied in the text. The central figure of this part of the chronicle is king Duṭṭhagāmaṇi, the national hero of Ceylon and great builder of Buddhist religious monuments. The chronology of the kings as found in this and the earlier chronicle is now considered workable and generally correct.¹ Here the historical position of the chronicles may be partially tested by the evidence of the ancient inscriptions which are written in Asokan and later Brāhmī. Unfortunately, however, none of the names by which the early kings of Ceylon are introduced in these inscriptions is identical with that which occurs in the chronicles. The identifications so far suggested are just tentative.²

These inscriptions envisage a political history of Ceylon from Uttiya, the brother and successor of Devānampiya Tissa, to Gajabāhuka Gāmaṇi (A.D. 173–195), more definitely from Saddhā Tissa, the younger brother and successor of Duṭṭhagāmaṇi Abhaya, to Gajabāhuka Gāmaṇi.³ The two main heroes, Devānampiya Tissa and Duṭṭhagāmaṇi, are still missed in them. The employment of Devanapiya as a royal honorific goes certainly to prove that the tradition of Asoka was maintained in Ceylon up till the second century A.D., if not still later. Although their language, the Elu, bears all the distinctive characteristics of a dialect once current in the lower Punjab, on the eastern side of the Indus and near about Mansehra, their Brāhmī letter-forms go to connect them first with Asoka's inscriptions at Isila (Northern Mysore) and subsequently with the Buddhist cave inscriptions of Western India. It will be highly important and interesting to see if they can be connected as well with the old Brāhmī inscriptions of Amarāvati, Jagayyapeta and Nāgārjunikoṇḍa, particularly those at the last mentioned place.

¹ Wickremasinghe, On Rīṭigala Inscriptions, Epigraphia Zeyl., Vol. I, p. 143.

² Ibid., Vol. I, pp. 141ff.

³ Ibid., Vol. I, pp. 141ff.

So far as the ancient inscriptions of Ceylon go, they point to a much simpler state of things than what appears in the chronicles. It is difficult to think that anything of architectural importance and beauty was or could be built in the time of Devānampiya Tissa. The vigorous creative activity of the art and architecture of Ceylon began during the reign of Duṭṭhagāmaṇi and was continued through subsequent reigns. The Dīpavaṃsa accounts are scrappy and in some places clumsy and vague. The Mahāvamsa has clarified them in many respects. And yet it seems that the later chronicle has antedated some of the achievements.

According to both the chronicles, Duṭṭhagāmaṇi attained the paramount position in the early history of Ceylon by giving a crushing defeat to the Tamil hordes led by Elāra who appeared in the island as a horse-dealer. A graphic description of the battles fought and won is given in the Mahāvamsa. The coming of the merchants and traders from India is a fact, which is borne out by some of the ancient inscriptions of Ceylon. But no inscription is found until now to confirm the truth of the battles fought by Duṭṭhagāmaṇi with Elāra and his lieutenants.

The Dīpavaṃsa represents Duṭṭhagāmaṇi as the builder of a magnificent palace of nine storeys in height, while Mahā Tissa or Saddhā Tissa, his brother and successor, is given the credit for the erection of the Lohapāsāda or 'Brazen Palace'. Both of them figure equally as the builders of the Mahāthūpa. In the earlier description and estimation Duṭṭhagāmaṇi's fame was worthily emulated by Saddhā Tissa. In the later chronicle Duṭṭhagāmaṇi alone is highly extolled as the builder of the Lohapāsāda, the Mahāthūpa, and the Maricavattivihāra. The fame of Saddhā Tissa fades away before the heightened glory of the achievements of his elder brother. The Dīpavaṃsa names fourteen Theras who came down from India when the foundation of the Mahāthūpa was laid by Duṭṭhagāmaṇi without mentioning the centres of the Theravāda Buddhism represented by them.¹ The list of places is supplied by the Mahāvamsa, and it is to all intents and purposes the same as that contained in one of the Nāgārjunikoṇḍa inscriptions.

The disturbed reign of Vaṭṭagāmaṇi, the son and successor of Saddhā Tissa, rightly engages the attention of the chroniclers. He figures prominently also in some of the ancient inscriptions of Ceylon. His fame rests on these three facts: (1) as the vanquisher of the Tamil usurpers, (2) as the king who caused the Pali Canonical texts to be committed to writing, and (3) as the builder of the Abhayagiri monastery. His seven lieutenants heartily co-operated with him in building up a memorable tradition of art and architecture standing as a lasting symbol of piety.

From Vaṭṭagāmaṇi's son down to Mahāsena one notices a smooth course of political history. The chief event to be noted in the religious history of the period is the rivalry between the Fraternity of the Mahāvihāra and the Abhayagiri Vihāra which led ultimately to the rise of a few Buddhist sects in Ceylon.

The earlier chronicle is unaware of the six later Buddhist sects that arose in India, and of the two sects, the Dhammaruci and the Sāgaliya, that arose in the island. Buddhaghosa, the author of the Kathāvatthu-aṭṭhakathā, was acquainted with the names and doctrines of the later Buddhist sects but with none of the sects in Ceylon.

Buddhaghosa, the author of the Samantapāsādikā, speaks of a serious dispute which arose in the Buddhist community of Ceylon over the legality of certain Vinaya rules. King Bhātika (Bhātu Tissa) heard the two parties in an assembly of the monks called for the purpose and decided the point at issue by the verdict given by his Brāhman minister named Dīghakārāyana.² The chronicles refer this incident to the reign of Abhaya or Vohārika Tissa, the son and successor of Sirināga. According to the earlier chronicle, the monks against whom Kapila, the minister of Tissa, expressed his judgment are described as 'wicked' (pāpabhikkhu),³ while the later chronicle calls them upholders of Vetullavāda or Vedallavāda.⁴ The Dīpavamsa term is definitely Vitaṇḍavāda.⁵

The Mahāvamsa tells us that the rival Abhayagiri Vihāra became a stronghold of the sixty monks preaching the Vetulya heresy, all of whom were banished from the island by ¹ Dīpavamsa, XIX, vv. 5-10.

² Cf. Samantapāsādikā, III, pp. 582-3.

⁴ Mahāvamsa, XXXVI, 41.

³ Dīpavamsa, XXII, 44.

⁵ Dīpavamsa, XXII, 43.

Gothābhaya Meghavanna, the reigning king. We are also told that to avenge their cause a powerful Cohan monk named Sanghamutta, well versed in sorcery, witchcraft, and the like (bhūtavijjādi kovidō) came across from the Indian shore. It is said that he defeated the Mahāvihāra defender of the Theravāda by his arguments in an assembly of the monks caused to be called for the purpose by the king at Thūpārāma. The Thora Sanghapāla was evidently then the head of the Mahāvihāra.¹ The crusade against the Mahāvihāra was vigorously led by this Sanghamutta during the reign of Mahāsena, having Sona among the royal councillors as his strong lay supporter.² The Dīpaṃsa makes mention of this mischievous activity and refers it in the same way to the reign of Mahāsena. But the heresies mentioned were not of a serious character, and they tended just to relax two Vinaya rules.³

Buddhaghosa in his commentary on the Kathāvatthu, has ascribed certain special views to the upholders of the Vetullavāda. The bearing of the Mahāvamsa report of the debate held at Thūpārāma between Sanghamutta and the spokesman of the Mahāvihāra in the presence of king Gothābhaya Meghavanna, father of Mahāsena, and grandfather of Kittisiri Meghavanna, on the contemporaneity and age of Buddhadatta and Buddhaghosa, the author of the Visuddhimagga, has been fully discussed. The authoritative works of the Vetullavādins mentioned in the Sāratthappaḷāsini and the Samanapāsādikā have also been identified. They belonged mostly to the Guhyasamāja sect and the popular form of Mahāyāna. But the more appropriate name of the dreaded doctrine was rather Vedallavāda than Vetullavāda.⁴

The Mahāvamsa does nowhere clarify the connection of the two Buddhist sects of Ceylon, namely, the Dhammaruci and the Sāgaliya, with the Abhayagiri Vihāra and its seceders. The connection is supplied somewhat ingeniously in the Tilā and the Nikāyasangraha. These later works trace the history of the schisms in the Saṅgha of Ceylon from the days of Vattagāmaṇi. The author of the Dīpaṃsa supplement (Chaps. XVII-XXII) had nothing to say regarding the cause which arose for the separation of the monks of Abhayagiri from the Mahāvihāra and the formation of the Dhammaruci sect under the persuasion of an Indian teacher, Dhammaruci, of the Vajjiputtaka community of Pallārāma in South India.

¹ Mahāvamsa XXXVI 110-116

² ibid. XXXVII, 24-27

³ The University of Ceylon Times Vol. II

⁴ Jātakamaṇi XXII 64-74

It was during the reign of Vohāra Tissa that the Dhammarucikas of Abhayagiri adopted the Vetulla or Vedalla Piṭaka. The king caused the Vetulla books to be examined by his learned minister, Kapila, and finding that they were not the words of the Buddha, caused them to be burnt and the sinful priests to be disgraced. But from the account given by Buddhaghosa it appears that the difference hinged on a Vinaya point of minor importance. It was apparently a case of controversial nicety (vitandavāda) as the Dīpavaṃsa puts it.¹

The ingenuity is evidently carried too far by the compiler of the Nikāyaśaṅgraha when it wants us to believe that the Vetulla or Vedalla texts mentioned in the Pali commentaries were the works produced by the six later Buddhist sects of India, which arose in later times:

‘The Hemavata heretics fabricated the Varṇa-piṭaka, giving it a semblance of true doctrine and making it appear as if preached by the Buddha. The Rājagiri heretics composed the Āṅgulimāla-piṭaka, the Siddhārthaka heretics the Gūḍha Vessantara, the Pūrvaśailī heretics the Raṭṭhapāla-garjita, the Aparāśailī heretics, the Ālavaka-garjita, and the Wajraparvata heretics the Gūḍhavinaya. These last also composed the Tantras: Māyājālatantra,² Samājatantra, Mahā-samayatatva, Tattvasaṅgraha, Bhūtaśākhā (śākhā),³ Vajrāmṛta,⁴ Cakrasaṃvara,⁵ Dvādaśacakra, Bherukāḍbuda,⁶ Mahāmāyā,⁷ Padanikṣepa, Catuṣpuṣṭa,⁸ Parāmarda,⁹ Maricudbhava, Sarvabuddhasarvaguhyasamuccaya,¹⁰ etc., and the Kalpa-

¹ Dīpavaṃsa, XXII, vv. 43–45; Mahāvamsa, XXXVI, v. 41.

² Māyājālatantra. Cf. Commentary, Māyājālamahātāntra rājaṭikā, Rgyud, LVI, 2; Pañjikā, Rgyud, LVI, 3. Probably the same as Māyājālamahātāntra, Nanjio No. 1022, translated by Fa-Hien, A.D. 982–1001.

³ Bhūtaśākhā tantra—probably the same as Bhūtaśākhāmahātāntrarāja, Nanjio, No. 1031, translated by Fa-Hien in A.D. 973–981. Cf. Bhūtaśākhā-sādhana and Bhūtaśākhā-saṅkhipta-sādhana, P. Cordier, Catalogue Du Fonds, Tibetan, Rgyud, LXX, 164; LXXI, 337 and LXXXIII, 40.

⁴ Vajrāmṛta. Nanjio (Nos. 372–373) mentions Vajramantra-Dhāraṇī.

⁵ Cakrasaṃvara. Cf. Commentary, Cakrasaṃvara tantrarājasamvarasamuccaya, Cordier, op. cit., Rgyud, VIII, 1.

⁶ Bherukāḍbutatantra. Cf. Commentary Heruka-abhyudaya mahāyoginī-tantrarāja, Cordier, op. cit., Rgyud, XII, 2.

⁷ Mahāmāyā. Cf. Cordier, op. cit., Rgyud, XXIII, 18. Cf. Mahāmāyā sūtra, Nanjio 382, translated in A.D. 550–577.

⁸ Catuṣpuṣṭa. Cf. Commentary, Catuhpīṭha Gūḍhārthanirdeśa ekadrupa-pañjikā, Cordier, op. cit., Rgyud, XXIII, 7.

⁹ Parāmarda. Cf. Paramārthi-tantrabhūṣitā pañcadaśāpatti, Cordier, op. cit., Rgyud, LXXXV, 55. Cf. Paramārthadharmaviṣaya sūtra and Paramārthasamvritinirdeśa sūtra, Nanjio, Nos. 210–211, 1084, 1089 and 1101.

¹⁰ Sarvabuddha-Sarvaguhya samuccaya. Cf. Commentaries Sarvakalpa-samuccaya nāma Sarvabuddhasamayoga śākinījālasambarottarottara tantraṭikā, Cordier, op. cit., Rgyud, XXV, 2; Pradīpa, Rgyud, XLV, 24; Sarvaguhya-pradīpaṭikā, Rgyud, XXVIII, 3.

śāstras: Māyāmarīkalpa, Herambakalpa, Trisamayakalpa,¹ Rājakalpa, Wajragandhārakalpa,² Marīciguhyakalpa, Suddha-samuccaya-kalpa,³ etc.

We are also told that the Vaitulya horoties composed the Vaitulya Piṭaka, the Andhakas, the *Ratnakūṭa Sūtra*⁴ and other works, and the Anyā-mahāsaṅghikas, the *Akṣarasūri*⁵ and other sūtras.⁶ The Nikāyasaṅgraha categorically states that despite many divisions that occurred, the religion of the Buddha retained its purity for two hundred and nineteen years from the Third Buddhist Council.⁷

The list of Buddhist works belonging to the Vetulla or Vedalla Piṭaka grew up gradually. According to the Nikāyasaṅgraha, the Vaitulya works were brought to Laikā on three successive occasions and burnt to ashes by sincere rulers. On the fourth occasion they were introduced by a merchant called Pūrṇa 852 years after the establishment of the Buddhist faith in the island during the reign of Devānampiyā Tissa and 1088 years after the demise of the Buddha.⁸ On the first three occasions it was the Dharmarucikas of Abhayagiri who welcomed those texts which were incompatible with the true words of the Buddha. On the fourth occasion, however, the Dharmarucikas persuaded the Sāgaliyas of the Jetavana monastery to welcome them. It is said that during the reign of Aggabodhi I (A.D. 625-58) a Mahāthera named Jotipāla came down from India to try an issue with the Vaitulya horoties giving them a crushing defeat.⁹ Thereafter there were no more converts to the Votullavāda. It was again during the reign of Sena I (A.D. 887-907) that a Buddhist priest of the Vājirīya sect came to the island from India and dwelt in an abode called Viraṅkura. He impressed the reigning king with his 'secret discourse', which he called a

¹ Trisamayakalpa. Cf. Trisamayajyāsthana, Cordier, op. cit., Pypst, LXX, 6; LXXI, 95-96.

² Wajragandhārakalpa. Cf. Wajragandhārikāsthana, Cordier, op. cit., Pypst, LXX, 123; LXXI, 80.

³ Nikāyasaṅgraha, p. 9.

⁴ Nanjio No. 251—translated by An-shi kao of the Eastern Han dynasty, A.D. 25-220. Nanjio No. 51, translated by Jñānagupta of the Śui dynasty A.D. 589-618.

⁵ Akṣarasūri Sūtra, probably same as Akṣaramatinirdeśa sūtra, Nanjio No. 74. Translated by Dharmarakṣa of the Western Tsin dynasty A.D. 265-317. Nanjio No. 77—translated in the Eastern Han dynasty A.D. 422-479.

⁶ Nalīya-saṅgraha, pp. 9ff.

⁷ Ibid., p. 10.

⁸ Cūḍavagga, 42, 35.

⁹ Ibid., p. 17.

Tadā eko mahāthero Jotipālo mahāsaṅgha-paripṛcchī mahāsaṅgha-dīpa-śatullasāna. Cf. Nalīya-saṅgraha, p. 17.

confidential teaching. It was at this time that the Ratnakūṭa teaching and the like were introduced into Laṅkā.¹

It will be seen that the Buddhist works mentioned above were all texts on ritual and magic. They were far from giving the Theras of Ceylon a correct idea of the greatness and excellence of Mahāyāna proper, the Bodhisattva-naya or Agranaya form of Mahāyāna. The doctrinal views ascribed by Buddhaghosa and Vasumitra to the Pūrvaśailas, the Aparaśailas, and the rest go only to represent them as advanced thinkers among the Buddhist teachers of the age.² The Theras of Ceylon were forgetful of the fact that their Paritta texts were also works on ritual and magic. The authenticity of the Parittas themselves was in dispute, and we have certain findings on this point from the Thera Nāgasena.³

As to the Mahāthera Jotipāla the chronicles leave us in the dark about his identity with the Bhadanta Jotipāla at whose instance Buddhaghosa undertook to write his commentaries on the Samyutta and Aṅguttara Nikāyas.⁴ As a contemporary of king Aggabodhi I he was unquestionably a later personality.

According to the Mahāvamsa-Tīkā the Sāgalikas or Sāgaliyas were seceders from the Dhammarucikas. Their separation from the latter took place during the reign of king Goṭhābhaya and the name of the sect was derived from its leader, the Thera Sāgala.⁵ The Jetavana-vihāra became the stronghold of this sect. The Mahāvamsa-Tīkā leads us to think that the Dhammarucikas and their offshoots, the Sāgalikas, possessed slightly different versions of the Vinaya texts.⁶ The two sects belonging to the parent vihāra of Abhayagiri flourished side by side along with the Mahāvihāra, and continued to receive royal benefactions⁷ until all of them were united into one order in the time of Parakkamabāhu I (A.D. 1153-86).⁸

¹ Nikāya-saṅgraha, p. 18.

² Points of Controversy, P.T.S. Tr., pp. xx ff.

³ Milinda, pp. 150ff.

⁴ B. C. Law, Buddhaghosa, p. 34.

⁵ Vamsatthappakāsinī, p. 176.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 175-6, 676.

⁷ Cūlavamsa, XXXVIII, 75; XXXIX, 15, 41.

⁸ Ibid., LXXVIII, 21-27.

INDEX

Abhaya, 52
 Abhayagiri Vihāra, 15
 Aggabodhi, 70
 Aggimittā, 7
 Agranaya, 71
 Ajātasattu, 49
 Akkharasāri 70
 Alakeśvara, 27
 Amarāvati, 66
 Amitodana, 51
 Anāgatavaṃsa, 29
 Aṅgulimālapiṭaka, 69
 Añjali, 7
 Antarāla, 41
 Anurādhagāma, 51
 Anurādhapura, 44
 Anuṣṭubh, 41
 Anyamahāsaṅghikas, 58
 Apadāna, 29
 Apra Rājagirikā, 6
 Aparānta, 62
 Aparasāila, 58
 Aparaseliyā, 6
 Aritṭha, 8
 Asoka, 26, 54, 57
 Atiśarkarī, 41
 Attanagaluvaṃsa, 27
 Atṭhakathā Mahāvaṃsa, 30
 Atthasālinī, 11, 41
 Ājīvika, 54
 Ākhyāna, 33
 Ālavakagarjita, 69
 Āmoda, 41
 Āraṇyakavāsī Sect, 2

 Barua, B. M., 5, 12, 58
 Bhaddakaccānā, 50
 Bhāgineyya, 22
 Bhandarkar, D. R., 58
 Bharukaccha, 48
 Bharukādbuda, 69
 Bhātika, 8
 Bhātiya Abhaya, 8
 Bhavya, 57
 Bhutacāmara, 69
 Bhutaḍāmara, 69
 Bhuvanekabāhu, 27
 Bimbisāra, 56
 Bindusāra, 50
 Bodhisattvanaya, 71
 Bodhivaṃsa, 20
 Brhadāraṇyakopaniṣad, 29
 Broach, 48
 Buddhadatta, 39.
 Buddhaghosa, 1, 8, 11, 31

Buddhavaṃsa, 32
 Buddhist Council, First, 35

 Calukavatti, 55
 Cakrasaṃvara, 69
 Cānakya, 59
 Candagutta, 52
 Caṇḍālas, 53
 Candragomin, 23
 Candra-vyākaraṇa, 23
 Cariyāpiṭaka, 29
 Catuspuṣṭa, 69
 Cetiyaṭṭhapaṭṭa, 44
 Cetiyaṭṭhapaṭṭa, 21
 Cetiyaṭṭhapaṭṭhakathā, 1
 Cetiyaṭṭhapaṭṭhaka, 55
 Ceylon, 15, 19, 43
 Christ, Jesus, 46
 Coḷa, 25
 Coomaraswamy, E. M., 1
 Coranūga, 8
 Cūlavāṃsa, 1, 12, 15, 16, 38
 Cūlavagga, 36, 57
 Cūlodara, 46

 Dādaśacakra, 69
 Daladā-Pūjāvalī, 24
 Daladāvaṃsa, 23
 Dāmodaradeva, 52
 Dardistan, 49
 Dāsikā, 7
 Dāthādadhātuvāṃsa, 22
 Dāthānāga, 20
 Dāthāvaṃsa, 1, 22, 40,
 Dāthopatiṣṭha, 22
 Devagabbhā, 52
 Devakūṭa, 44
 Devānaṃpiyatissa, 33
 Dhammadāsiyā, 7
 Dhammakitti, 16, 22
 Dhammaruci, 68
 Dhammarucika, 69
 Dhammasaṅgaṇi, 41
 Dhammāsoka, 49
 Dhātusena, 2, 22
 Dhātusena-pabbata, 15
 Dhātuvāṃsa, 1
 Dīghāsana, 15
 Dīghasandana, 15
 Dīghasanda-senāpati-pariveṇa, 15
 Dīghavāpi-cetiya, 46
 Dīghāvu, 52
 Dīghāvugāma, 51
 Dipavaṃsa, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7
 Divyāvadāna, 63

Dīpavamsa aññhakathā, 10

Drāviḍa, 62

Duṭṭhagāmaṇi, 65

Duṭṭhagāmaṇi Abhaya, 7

Extended Mahāvamsa, 37

Firdausi, 36

Gajabāhukagāmaṇi, 65

Gandhavamsa, 39

Gaṇṭhipada-vapṇanā, 19

Gaṇṭhipadatthavannanā, 39

Geiger, 1, 13, 19

Giridīpa, 45

Girikandhasīra, 54

Gotama, 29

Goṭhābhaya, 25

Gudha, 99

Gudhavinaya, 69

Guhyaśamāja, 68

Habaragāma, 44

Haryāṅka, 50

Haṭṭhavanagalla-āyihāravamsa, 25

Hemū, 7

Hemavatikā, 6

Hirambakalpa, 70

Himavanta, 62

Hsuen Tsang, 49

Indian Antiquary, 1

Indravajrā, 41

Issarasamañārāma, 22

Jagati, 41

Jagayyapeta, 66

Jambudīpa, 59

Jambukolapaṭṭana, 40

Jambukolavihāra, 55

Jātaka, Vesantara, 21

Jātaka-nidānakathā, 26

Jātakaññhakathā, 20

Kaccāna, 50

Kākavanna Tissa, 7

Kakusandha, 43

Kālāsoka, 55

Kālavela, 53

Kāḥapa, 36

Kalpasūtra, 29

Kalyāṇi, 46

Kalyāṇi-cetiya, 46

Kamasi, 52

Kanakadattā, 6

Kandagiri, 22

Kandragiri, 22

Kapiraka, 55

Kapilavattī, 47, 51

Karmāta, 62

Kassapa Garbhāra, 62

Kassagiri, 22

Kassapa, 43

Kassapaguruvihāra, 22

Kāthāvattihuppakarana-aññhakathā, 6

Kauśāmbi, 58

Kāveri, 62

Kern, 23

Kattisirimeghavappa, 23

Kattisirimājasīha, 17, 43

Koṇḍagamana, 43

Kumbhaṇḍa, 54

Kuṭṭikappa Abhaya, 7

Kuṭṭikappa Tissa, 7

Lāda, 48

Lankādīpa, 61

Lankāvijaya, 33

Lūṣa, 48

Lilāvati, 23

Linatthadīpani-ṭikā, 24

Lohapāsāda, 60

McCindle, 44, 54

Magadha, 49

Mahābhārata, 36, 50

Mahābodhi cetiya, 48

Mahābodhivamsa, 19, 39

Mahābodhivamsakathā, 19

Mahācetiya-vamsa, 21

Mahācetiya-vamsa aññhakathā, 20

Mahādevi, 7

Mahāgaṇḍā, 46

Mahākandara, 50

Mahākassapa, 50

Mahāligāma, 51

Mahāmāyā, 69

Mahānāga, 8

Mahānāma, 12, 13

Mahāpadāna suttanta, 29

Mahāpaṭṭhāpatti Gotami, 7

Mahāparinibbāna suttanta, 34

Mahārājajavamsa, 46

Mahārājha, 62

Mahāvaminata, 46

Mahāvāghika, 5, 54

Mahāvāggitī, 67

Mahāvamsa, 9, 69

Mahāvamsa, 2, 3, 4, 12, 31, 49

Mahāvamsa aññhakathā, 9, 11, 14

Mahāvastu, 8

Mahāvīlāra, 68

Mahāvīra, 29

Mahāvācchagā, 46

Mahāśāḍḍipa, 48

Mahinda, 4, 6, 34

Mahāsamaratana, 62

Mahāyānagana etipa, 46

Mahāyāna, 46

Mahāyānagana, 1, 17, 19

Mahāyānagana, 60

Mahāyā, 7

- Maṇḍadīpa, 44, 45
 Maṇḍākrāntā, 41
 Maṇiakkhika, 46
 Mañjuśrīmūlakalpa, 59
 Maṇorathapūraṇī, 41
 Maṇicavaṭṭivihāra, 66
 Maṇiciguhyakalpa, 70
 Maṇicudbhava, 69
 Mattā, 7
 Matthew, St., 46
 Māyājāla-tantra, 69
 Māyāmaṇicikalpa, 70
 Megasthenes, 48
 Meghavanārāma, 46
 Milindapañho, 39
 Moggaliputta Tissa, 61
 Moriyakūla, 59
 Muṭasiva, 52

 Nagaraguttika, 53
 Nāgārjunikoṇḍa, 66
 Nāgas, 44, 45
 Nāgasena, 71
 Nālandā, 58
 Nalāṭadhātuvamśa, 1, 25, 42
 Nandagopā, 52
 Niddesa, 5
 Nigrodha, 64
 Nikāyasaṅgraha, 14, 26
 Nirgranthas, 53
 Nissāṅkamalla, 48

 Ojadīpa, 45
 Okkāka, 18, 47
 Oldenberg, 1, 2

 Pācīnavihāra, 55
 Padumā, 7
 Pajjapadoruvamśa, 12
 Paṇḍaraṅga-paribbājakas, 60
 Paṇḍuka, 52
 Paṇḍukābhaya, 52
 Paṇḍuvāsa, 50
 Paṇḍuvāsudeva, 50
 Pāṇḍya, 49
 Paññānanda, 12
 Papañcasūdanī, 41
 Parakkamabāhu I, 17, 71
 Parakkamabāhu II, 25
 Parakkamabāhu IV, 26
 Paramatthadīpanī on Therīgāthā, 30
 Paribbājakārāma, 54
 Parivāra, 5, 6, 8
 Pasādapāla, 7
 Pāṭaliputra, 54
 Paṭhamathūpa, 55
 Pathyavaktra, 41
 Paṭisambhidāmagga, 25
 Petavatthu, 57
 Pheggu, 7
 Piśācas, 45

 Piyadāsa, 31
 Piyadassana, 31, 63
 Porāṇā, 35
 Porāṇaṭṭhakathā, 12, 14
 Pubbaseliya, 6
 Pujāvalī, 26
 Punjab, 66
 Purvaśaila, 58, 71

 Rājagirikā, 6
 Rājaparamparā, 47
 Rājaratnākara, 27
 Rājatarāṅgiṇī, 36
 Rājāvaliya, 18
 Rākkhasas, 45
 Rāmagāma, 51
 Rāmañña, 17
 Ratnakūṭa Sūtra, 70
 Raṭṭhapāla-garjita, 69
 Rhys Davids, 59
 Rohiṇīgāma, 51
 Rucānandā, 6

 Saddhammaratnākara, 27
 Saddhammasaṅgaha, 41
 Saddhānanda, 41
 Saddhātissa, 65
 Sāgala, 39
 Sāgaliya, 71
 Sāhasamalla, 48
 Sahassavatthu-aṭṭhakathā, 38
 Śākyas, 50, 51
 Samantapāsādikā, 4, 6, 8, 11, 20
 Samataṭa, 52
 Saṅghapāla, 68
 Sāñcī, 58
 Saṅghamittā, 6, 7, 34
 Sāratthadīpanī, 23
 Śārkārī, 41
 Sarvabuddhasarvaguhyasamuccaya, 69
 Sārdūlavikrīḍita, 41
 Sārnāth, 58
 Sāsanaavamśadīpa, 1
 Serissakavatthu, 57
 Shāhnāmāh, 36
 Sihabāhu, 47
 Sihala-namakkāra-vaṇṇanā, 38
 Śikhariṇī, 41
 Siṃhalas, 49
 Sinhalese aṭṭhakathā, 31
 Sirināga, 8
 Sirisaṅghabodhi, 25
 Śīsunāga, 56
 Soṇa, 14
 Sonārī, 64
 Sopārā, 48
 Sragdharā, 41
 Sthavira, 64
 Strong, Arthur, 39
 Subhakūṭa, 44
 Suddhasamuccayakalpa, 70

- Suddhodana, 51
 Sudhammā, 6
 Sumanakūta, 44
 Sumangala, 12
 Sumangalavilāsini, 1
 Sumedha, 32
 Suppāraka, 48
 Suvannabhūmi, 62

 Tambapannidīpa, 43
 Tāmrāparṇī, 49
 Tāpasas, 53
 Tarkaśāstra, 23
 Theraparamparā, 47
 Thera Therī gāthā, 33
 Thūpārāma, 46
 Thūpārāma cetiya, 46
 Thūpavamsa, 24
 Tissa, Kutikaṇṇa, 7
 Tissarakkhā, 63
 Trisamayakalpa, 70
 Trīstūbh, 41
 Turnour, 21

 Ujjaini, 62
 Unnalā, 7
 Upajāti, 41
 Upasena, 21
 Upatissa, 20
 Upendravajra, 41
 Uppalavaṇṇa, 54
 Uttarā, 7
 Uttaravihāra Mahāvamsa, 18
 Uttiya, 65

 Vācissara, 25, 40
 Vaddhamāna, 44
 Vajragandhārakalpa, 70
 Vajrāmṛta, 69
 Vamśabrāhmaṇa, 29
 Vamśastha, 41

 Vamsatthappakāsini, 9, 10, 21, 22
 Varadīpa, 45
 Vasantatilakā, 41
 Vāsabha, 8
 Vāsudeva, 52
 Vasumitra, 57, 58
 Vaṭṭagāmaṇi, 11
 Vaṭṭagāmaṇi Abhaya, 67
 Vedallavāda, 68
 Veddās, 44, 45
 Vesālī, 54, 57
 Vessagiri, 22
 Vessavanakuvera, 53
 Vetulyavāda, 68
 Vibhanga, Bhikkhu and Bhikkhū
 Vīdisā, 60
 Vīdūdabba, 51
 Vijaya, 3, 33, 34, 47
 Vijayabāhu II, 17
 Vimalasāra, 1
 Vīmānavatthu, 57
 Vinaya, 23
 Vinayasangraha, 23
 Vinayaṭṭhakathā, 31
 Vinīta-deva, 57
 Viśāla, 44
 Viṣṇu, 54
 Vitandavāda, 69
 Vohārikatissa, 67
 Vuttamālā, 1, 28

 Wama-piṭaka, 69
 Watters, 51
 Wijesinha, 12

 Yakkhas, 44
 Yakkhini, Assamukhi, 53
 Yona, 62

 ZDMG, 1

